Mr. LEWIS. The express company has no franchise, because that is a privilege granted by the State or the Government to an individual or company. Has the gentleman not noticed the line of authorities to the effect that in eminent-domain proceedings business values or good will are not subjects of compensation?

Mr. TOWNER. I understand that in some instances the right of condemnation of tangible property is not to be considered as also embracing the right of good will. I think the gentleman is right in part in that contention. I am not sure, however, in that regard, that I would go as far as the gentleman contends. One ought not to speak dogmatically regarding these matters, especially until he has heard all of the argument on both sides, but it is my judgment that the proposition involved in this case will not be determined by whether or not these companies hold or do not hold a franchise, but it will be determined as to whether or not the ending of their business and of their contracts is or is not a taking by the Government from them of property of value, and, in my judgment, the uttermost value that could be justly shown would have to be paid for by the Government.

I would like very much to have the privilege of hearing these legal propositions discussed by gentlemen on the other side who favor them.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. There is to me a very important legal question involved aside from the one the gentleman has mentioned. It was in part suggested by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. A railroad company is a corporation having a charter to carry on interstate commerce—the carriage of passengers and the carriage of freight. Can that corporation, having that charter, enter into a contract with an individual such as these railroad companies have already entered into with the express companies, by which the railroad companies are to be relieved absolutely from all liability for the loss of small packages? If they can legally enter into a contract which will exempt this chartered corporation from the liability as a common carrier for the carrying of the small packages, it can enter into the same sort of a contract for the carrying of large packages and a contract which will exempt it from all liability for the carriage of freight or express packages as a common carrier.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the suggestion of the gentleman is certainly a very pregnant one.

Mr. COOPER. Can it do it?

Mr. TOWNER. In my judgment it can not.

Mr. COOPER. If that is so, then what contract have these express companies with the railroad companies which need trouble us at all? According to the gentleman's suggestion just now, they have not a valid contract. They have a contract to-day. They are not corporations. They are associations, or partnerships, or individuals, say. The gentleman has just said they can not enter into a contract for the carrying of freight with these partnerships which will exempt the railroad companies in event of loss. Is that an invalid contract?

Mr. TOWNER. It has not been so declared as yet, I will suggest to my friend, and I am not sure that it would ever be so declared. But this is true, that we are now seeking to condemn that which these gentlemen themselves say is property. They contend these contracts are property, and until they have been declared invalid they certainly are. As long as it is a going concern it would probably be so considered.

I have not been able, Mr. Chairman, and am not now able to determine from the statements that have been made by those who believe in this action that is suggested on the part of the Government—I have never been able yet to discover what advantage it would be to the Government to enter upon this line of business. Certainly the Government has the power to compel the express companies, as has been well shown here this afternoon, to make their rates reasonable to the people. There can be no question about that. And, more than that, the Government has the right to enact such legislation as will entirely eliminate these "parasites," as the gentleman calls them, from the transportation of articles in the United States.

I think the gentleman is justified in using the term "parasites," because the express companies have never been really engaged in the transportation business of the United States. They have been merely brokers, who have been selling at exorbitant prices advantageous contracts that they themselves have obtained from the railroad companies for the carriage of this property. [Applause.] And so I have no hesitancy, and would have no hesitancy, to enact any legislation that would be deemed advantageous to the people of this country because of any consequences that might ensue to the express companies. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I intended to present to the committee some remarks on the question of public roads. I would like to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of parcel post in the RECORD by inserting certain data prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission in its pending exhaustive inquiry into the business methods and practices of express companies.

This data will, I am sure, prove very illuminating and useful to all of us. It is as follows:

Statement of securities of railroad, express, and other common carriers owned or held as security for loans of express companies named on June 30, 1911.

Statement showing comparison of revenues—passenger, mail, and express.

Analysis of freight revenue of Adams Express Co., August 18, 1909.

Comparative statement showing shipments not over 11 pounds—Adams Express Co.

Statement showing shipments less than 20 pounds in weight—Adams Express Co.

Analysis of freight revenue of United States Express Co. as of December 22, 1909.

Comparative statement showing shipments not over 11 pounds—United States Express Co.

Statement showing shipments less than 20 pounds—United States Express Co.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 27, 1912.

(Continuation of legislative day of Friday, April 26, 1912.)

The recess having expired at 10.30 a. m., the House was called to order by the Speaker.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The House, under the order adopted yesterday, automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] will take the chair.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT. I was not present when the order was made. Do I understand that the order is such as to prevent a request for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would think the terms of the order cuts out anything else. Some time to-day the committee may rise temporarily.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21279, the Post Office appropriation bill, with Mr. HAY in the chair.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I sought this recognition in order to make a statement which I desired to go in the RECORD. On yesterday I gave notice on the floor of the House that as soon as I could secure recognition to-day I would ask the House to take up and dispose of the amendment from the Senate in reference to the popular election of Senators. At that time it did not occur to me that this Post Office appropriation bill was under consideration and that it was as important as it is to secure early action and send the bill to the Senate. That matter has been called to my attention, and therefore I desire to announce now that I will not seek to take that matter up until after the disposition of the Post Office bill by the House.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] is on the floor, I yield to him. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana seems not to be present at this time, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL] will address the House in the 30 minutes yielded to him by Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, the concrete proposition to which I direct the attention of the House is embodied in the amendment agreed upon by the advocates of Federal aid to highway construction:

That for the purposes of this act certain highways of the several States, and the civil subdivisions thereof, are classified as follows:

Class A shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide, composed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam graded, crowned, compacted, and maintained in such manner that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface, and all other roads having a road track not less than 9 feet wide of a construction equally smooth, firm, durable, and expensive, and continuously kept in proper repair.

Class B shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide, composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface.

Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times.

SEC. 2. That whenever the United States shall use any highway of any State, or civil subdivision thereof, which falls within classes A, B, or C, for the purpose of transporting rural mail, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile for highways of class A, $20 per annum per mile for highways of class B, and $15 per annum per mile for highways of class C. The United States shall not pay any compensation or toll for such use of such highways other than that provided for in this section, and shall pay no compensation whatever for the use of any highway not falling within classes A, B, or C.

SEC. 3. That any question arising as to the proper classification of any road used for transporting rural mail shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 4. That the compensation herein provided for shall be paid at the end of each fiscal year by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Postmaster General to the officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act.

SEC. 5. That this act shall go into effect on the 1st day of July, 1913.

The basic principle of the measure is compensation by the Federal Government for the use of the roads traveled by carriers in the Rural Delivery Service. The number of miles now so utilized is 1,179,000, and no reason is perceived why the Government should not discharge its rental obligation for the use of these highways in a reasonable amount, to be calculated with reference to the character of each particular highway. For the purpose of this determination the bill divides roads into three classes:

(1) Class A. The highest form of improved road in the country, for which it is provided that the Government shall pay at the rate of $25 per mile per year.
(2) Class B. A thoroughfare of high quality, but not equaling class A, for which it is provided that the Government shall pay at the rate of $20 per mile per year.
(3) Class C. The ordinary dirt road of the country, somewhat improved, for which it is provided that the Government shall pay at the rate of $15 per mile per year.

No payment will be made for a road not within one of the prescribed classes, and the road authorities will be compelled to maintain the highway at the standard established in order to participate in the provisions of the bill. If this legislation is enacted, a steady and progressive improvement will characterize road conditions throughout the country. Dirt roads will be transformed into improved roads as rapidly as possible, to the end that the communities traversed may enjoy the compensation provided in the bill. The universality of benefit assured by this measure is its paramount merit. It will result in advantage to every State and practically to every community in the land.

Wherever a rural route extends, however remote from city or town, the stimulating effect of the measure will be immediately observed. The spirit of local improvement will not be impeded, but, on the contrary, it will be energized for the rehabilitation of highways everywhere. [Applause.]

This amendment in its entirety represents the individual opinion of no single Member of the House, but it is presented as the composite judgment of those of us who believe that legislation should be enacted to secure the systematic betterment of rural roads throughout the country. In this debate we have been entertained—I was about to say diverted—by the general character of the opposing arguments which have been advanced against the measure. It is denounced as "novel," "extravagant," and "revolutionary," and of course the time-honored objection that it is "unconstitutional" has not been omitted. Some gentlemen, notably from New York and Pennsylvania, are overwhelmed by surprise that a project so essentially visionary should be solemnly proposed in this presence. Their astonishment would demand more serious consideration if it were not so entirely absurd.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENDALL. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. There are some Members from Pennsylvania who wholly approve of the measure.

Mr. KENDALL. I am gratified to be advised of that fact. I know there are degrees in glory.

Government aid in the construction and improvement of highways for the benefit of the people was a fixed policy of the Republic in its infancy, and that policy continued without interruption for more than 40 years. The earlier statesmen were not disturbed by the constitutional apprehensions which appear now to occasion such genuine concern, for they understood that the organic law of the land was ordained to promote, not to prevent, the general welfare. [Applause.] They remembered that that immortal document conferred upon the Congress authority to establish post roads and to regulate interstate commerce, and they had practical wisdom enough to know that those provisions would be meaningless unless the revenues of the Government were available to render them effective. There is a popular conviction, prevailing now for more than a hundred years, that George Washington, who presided with his accustomed dignity over the deliberations of the Constitutional Convention, possessed some knowledge of the limitations upon the legislative power which the patriots who composed that convention intended to establish. It is encouraging to discover that the first President in his first message enjoined upon the Congress the propriety and duty of national road building. He said:

I can not forbear intimating to you the expediency of facilitating intercourse between distant parts of our country by a due attention to * * * post roads.

Two years later he returned to the subject and reenforced his recommendations as follows:

The importance of the post office and post roads on a plan sufficiently liberal and comprehensive as they respect the expedition, safety, and facility of communication is increased by their instrumentality in diffusing a knowledge of the laws and proceedings of the Government, which, while it contributes to the security of the people, serves also to guard them against the effects of misrepresentation and misconception.

Every lawyer of reputation entertains profound reverence for the constitutional opinions of James Madison, and in the third message he transmitted to the Congress after his accession to the Presidency he said:

Among the means of advancing the public interests the occasion is a proper one for recalling the attention of Congress to the great importance of establishing throughout our country the roads and canals which can be best executed under the national authority. Whilst the States individually, with a laudable enterprise and emulation, avail themselves of their local advantages by new roads * * * the General Government is the more urged to similar undertakings, requiring a national jurisdiction and national means, by the prospect of thus systematically completing so inestimable a work.

When Albert Gallatin was Secretary of the Treasury he was directed by resolution of the Senate "to prepare and report a plan for the application of such means as are within the power of Congress to the purposes of opening roads and making canals, which as objects of public improvement may require and deserve the aid of the Government." In obedience to that direction Mr. Gallatin responded in 1808 as follows:

The early and efficient aid of the Federal Government is recommended by still more important considerations. Good roads and canals will shorten distances, facilitate commercial and personal intercourse, and unite by a still more intimate community of interests the most remote quarters of the United States. No other single operation within the power of government can more effectually tend to strengthen and perpetuate that union which secures external independence, domestic peace, and internal liberty.

In December, 1818, the House of Representatives requested John C. Calhoun, who was then Secretary of War, to submit a report on the subject of Government aid to public roads, and in the following January Mr. Calhoun advised the Congress as follows:

But in such great undertakings (i. e., judicious systems of roads and canals), so interesting in every point of view to the whole Union, the expense ought not to fall wholly on the portions of the country immediately interested. As the Government has a deep stake in them it ought, at least, to bear a proportional share of the expense of their construction.

Mr. FOWLER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KENDALL. I yield first to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. FOWLER. I suppose the gentleman indorses the statement, having referred to it. What is the gentleman's greatest reason for requiring the Nation to assist in building these roads?

Mr. KENDALL. My fundamental reason is that the domestic communities have conclusively demonstrated that it is not possible for them to establish suitable highways in the country.

Mr. FOWLER. The proposition is too big?

Mr. KENDALL. The proposition is too comprehensive for any local community to grapple with, and it is so important as to be of national concern. Now I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] in part anticipated the question I was going to ask. The gentleman from Iowa has evidently given considerable thought to this question and I am interested in the discussion of it. If I understood the gentleman, he has no doubt about the constitutional power of the Federal Government to cooperate with the local authorities in building public highways.

Mr. KENDALL. A little later I will refer to an opinion of the Supreme Court which completely disposes of all controversy.

Mr. CULLOP. I understood the gentleman to say that the proposition of building good roads is too big for the community to enter into—that the undertaking is too heavy. Is that correct?

Mr. KENDALL. I meant that to apply particularly to the community in which I live. It may not be true in an older and richer State, like Indiana.

Mr. CULLOP. Has the gentleman ever had occasion to examine the gravel-road law of Indiana?

Mr. KENDALL. Only in a cursory way.

Mr. CULLOP. If the gentleman would examine it, he would find that any community is big enough to build its own roads.

Mr. KENDALL. You have there in Indiana all the materials necessary for good road construction. All the communities in the United States are not so favored.

Mr. CULLOP. We do not have the materials scattered all over Indiana. We sometimes ship the material as far as 150 miles.

Mr. KENDALL. You have the material where it is practically available for use by all sections of the State.

Mr. CULLOP. I think not more so than in the State of Iowa. They have gravel beds there also.

Mr. KENDALL. "Of all that is good Iowa affords the best."

Mr. CULLOP. Except Indiana. Our plan is to build the roads by the sale of bonds, 10 per cent of the principal falling due each year, so that they are 10 years paying for the road. The townships vote on the question. In other words, they pass on the question by the initiative and referendum. Fifty taxpayers petition the board of county commissioners to call an election.

Mr. KENDALL. I understand how they proceed.

Mr. CULLOP. The board of county commissioners pass upon the petition, and then they refer it back to the voters of that township. If it carries, they have the surveys made, the estimate of cost, and let the contracts, and then they sell the bonds. The county sells the bonds, but the entire property of the township is taxed to pay the bonds, and the interest and 10 per cent of the principal is paid each year. The plan is not excelled by any State in the Union, and under it we have built more and better roads than any other State. By adopting the same method other States could do the same thing.

Mr. KENDALL. Whatever the system you have adopted in Indiana, it has resulted in securing good highways.

Mr. CULLOP. Any State can build its own gravel roads under the plan adopted by Indiana.

Mr. KENDALL. I do not assent to that proposition without qualification. But to resume my discussion where I was interrupted.

In one of his annual messages to the Congress President Monroe employed this language:

> Great improvements may also be made by good roads, in proper directions, through the interior of the country. Much has been done by some of the States, but yet much remains to be done with a view to the Union.

John Quincy Adams, who was as wise as any in his day and generation, advised the Congress, in 1827, as to the projects then in construction or in contemplation:

> Continuation of the national road from Cumberland to the tidewaters within the District of Columbia; continuation of the national road from Canton to Zanesville; location of the national road from Zanesville to Columbus; continuation of the national road to the seat of government in Missouri; post road from Baltimore to Philadelphia; a national road from Washington to Buffalo.

I refer to these authorities for the purpose of disposing of the objection that the measure here now does not have the warrant of constitutional authority. But the Supreme Court has vindicated the power of Congress in decisions which are not susceptible of misconstruction:

> Congress has likewise the power, exercised early in this century by successive acts in the Cumberland or national road from the Potomac across the Alleghenies to the Ohio, to authorize the construction of a public highway connecting several States. (Ducton v. North River Bridge Co., 153 U. S., 525–529; Indiana v. United States, 148 U. S., 148.)

I interpret that as an unequivocal expression of the final conclusion of the highest judicial tribunal upon this subject.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENDALL. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. If it is constitutional for the General Government to provide for rivers and harbors throughout the country, why is it not constitutional to provide for national highways?

Mr. KENDALL. The propositions appear to me to be exactly analogous. If we have authority to appropriate $800,000,000, as I think has been done, for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country—and that is done for the purpose of facilitating transportation and accelerating communication—certainly we have authority under the same warrant to appropriate money to effectuate a similar purpose in the construction of highways.

Mr. LEVER. There is no difference of opinion, I think, as to the constitutional power of Congress to do this. It has been in the past a matter of expediency.

Mr. KENDALL. I gather from some suggestions advanced the other day that some gentlemen have very serious doubts about the constitutional power of Congress to divert money from the Public Treasury for this purpose. That is the reason I have devoted so much attention to the constitutional phases of the question.

An examination of the record will disclose that the Congress was not reluctant to exercise the power it admittedly possessed, and it did not hesitate to adopt the recommendations which I have reproduced. In 1811, 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the sales of public lands in Louisiana were transferred to that State for the building of roads and levees; in 1816, the same percentage of a similar fund to Indiana; in 1817, 4 per cent to Mississippi; in 1818, 2 per cent to Illinois; in 1819, 5 per cent to Alabama; in 1820, 5 per cent to Missouri; and in 1845, 5 per cent to Iowa. All for the same purpose. In the meantime the annual appropriations for the improvement of the Cumberland Road were continued. For the fiscal year 1819 over half a million dollars was donated, and on May 25, 1838, the last appropriation, amounting to $150,000, was made.

In all more than $8,000,000 was appropriated and applied to the improvement of the national highways, a sum vastly more embarrassing to the public revenues then than $80,000,000 would be at the present day. So we are not to be restrained by any uncertainty as to the constitutional power of the Congress to employ the resources of the Government for the improvement of the avenues of domestic communication. First and last we have subsidized the transcontinental railroads of the country with 260,000,000 acres of the public domain, worth at this moment not less than $30 per acre. I do not defend this donation, but everybody will agree that it has augmented the national wealth by many billions of dollars. Can it be doubted that, if the same generous policy were pursued in the construction and maintenance of public highways, the same beneficial and remunerative results would ensue. [Applause.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENDALL. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask if the gentleman regards the constitutionality of such work as resting alone in the constitutional provision that Congress has the power to establish post offices and post roads?

Mr. KENDALL. Not exclusively.

Mr. FOWLER. I though not.

Mr. KENDALL. It has the power to establish post offices and post roads, to regulate commerce between the States, and to provide for the general welfare.

Mr. FOWLER. And under those three provisions——

Mr. KENDALL. Certainly under one or the other of the provisions I have enumerated ample authority is contained for this appropriation.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman know of any other great improvement that could be inaugurated in America that would bring a greater and more lasting good to the masses of the people than the establishment of a good-roads system throughout the country?

Mr. KENDALL. I think there is none, and I think the position of our country is anomalous in this, that it is the only first-class power in the world that has not engaged in a systematic national improvement of its public highways. [Applause.]

The time to embark upon this reform is now. The platform adopted by the Republican national convention at Chicago in 1908 contained the following declaration:

> We recognize the social and economical advantages of good country roads, more and more largely at public expense and less and less at the expense of abutting property owners.

The platform adopted by the Democratic national convention at Denver, 1908, announced a similar doctrine in the following language:

> We favor Federal aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads.

Thus it will be observed that each of the great political organizations of the country has expressed approval of the appropriation of public money to the improvement of the highways of the United States. As the subject is in no sense sectional, so equally it is in no degree partisan. There have been introduced into this House 39 bills, some by Republicans and some by Democrats, some from the North and some from the South, to effectuate the common purpose contemplated in the foregoing platforms; and while these measures are different in detail, they are identical in the results attempted to be accomplished. More than 50 Members of this body, who have devoted industrious examination to the questions involved, have cooperated to prepare a proposition upon which all could unite, and the pending amendment is the compromise product of their intelligent labors.

The advantages of better roads can not be overestimated. Let me read you:

> No one thing can do so much to offset the tendency toward an unhealthy drain from the country into the city as the making and keeping of good roads. They are needed for the sake of their effect upon the industrial conditions of the country districts, and I am almost tempted to say that they are needed more for their effect upon the social conditions of the country. If winter means for the average farmer the existence of a long line of liquid morasses through which he has to move his goods if bent on business, or to wade or swim if bent on pleasure; if a little heavy weather means the stoppage of all communications, not only with the industrial centers but with the neighbors, then you must expect that there will be a great many young people of both sexes who will not find farm life attractive.

That is the language of Theodore Roosevelt, one of the most eminent publicists of this age. [Applause.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman in that connection if he would couple with the industrial and social uplift also the uplift of education throughout the country?

Mr. KENDALL. Of course. The far-reaching effects of the betterment of the highways of the country can not be confined within a single description.

Our country is the richest in the world in agriculture, manufacturing, and mining, but our popular thoroughfares are the most inferior. [Applause.] I have heard it asserted without contradiction that it costs as much to convey a bushel of grain 5 miles over the country roads of Iowa as it does to transport it by rail 1,200 miles to the seaboard. The expense of marketing farm products is 23 cents per ton per mile in the United States, while only 7 cents per ton per mile in France and 9 cents per ton per mile in Germany. It costs more to haul a load of corn over an average country highway 10 miles than it does to ship the corn by water from New York to Liverpool.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question for information?

Mr. KENDALL. I doubt whether I can afford the gentleman any information, but I cheerfully yield to him.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Oh, yes; the gentleman can. What countries in the world have the finest national highways?

Mr. KENDALL. I suppose it will be conceded that France has as good as any.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman if France did begin to build public highways earlier in her history than we, if we began now?

Mr. KENDALL. That has been the consistent history of France for more than 150 years, I think. That country has expended fabulous sums upon the improvement of her public highways. Napoleon, in one of his marvelous tributes to agriculture, referred to the necessity of suitable means of communication between the farm and the town.

Mr. LEVER. And the gentleman might add in that connection that the cost of transportation per ton per mile in France is about 7 cents.

Mr. KENDALL. I have said so. If we are looking for precedents in history, we have only to advert to Rome and to Greece, down from the ancient days to medieval times, and we would discover that good roads have always accompanied the highest degree of civilization. Good roads indicate enlightenment and bad roads evidence barbarism everywhere.

I have referred to the cost of marketing farm products. If I have stated the facts, and I believe they can not be controverted, the enormous capital wasted each year by the farmers of the United States because of bad roads is scarcely comprehensible. We are annually devoting $50,000,000 to the compensation of common carriers for the transportation of mail from coast to coast and from Lakes to Gulf. Surely we can afford to appropriate the modest sum provided in this amendment to the improvement of the public highways of the country. [Applause.] There are, in round numbers, 850,000,000 acres of land, improved and unimproved, in the United States. Substantially one-half of this land is in cultivation, and by the establishment of a suitable system of good roads it would be increased in value at least $10 per acre.

Mr. BOWMAN. Before the gentleman leaves the question of economy in connection with the improvement of the roads over which the rural routes will pass, has the gentleman considered what the economy to the Government would be in securing lower rates for the passage of mail over these roads occasioned by the improvement of the roads?

Mr. KENDALL. I am frank to say I doubt if that would follow.

Mr. BOWMAN. I may say for the gentleman's information, I know how these bids are made up, based on the time required to go over a given road.

Mr. KENDALL. What general character of service is the gentleman referring to now? Certainly not the Rural Service?

Mr. BOWMAN. The character of the mail service over the rural routes. If the roads are made better the bids for carriage will be much less.

Mr. KENDALL. I do not understand that the carrier service will be subject to competitive bids. That is not the method in our country and ought not to be, I think.

Mr. BOWMAN. You are right, but the improvement of the roads which would result from the passage of this measure would reduce the cost of the Rural Delivery Service to the carrier and hence ultimately to the Government.

Mr. KENDALL. The carrier would, of course, experience less difficulty in covering his route.

Mr. KONOP. Star routes are let by competition.

Mr. KENDALL. If the gentleman refers to star routes, that is perhaps true, but they, I think, are a disappearing adjunct of our postal system.

If we are to attain the ultimate productive capacity possible to us, if we are to develop adequately all of our material resources, if we are to realize the most salutary conditions which are attainable, then good roads are an imperative necessity. The prosperity of an enlightened people depends not more upon what it manufactures than upon what it extracts annually from the soil. Any departure, therefore, which will minimize the cost of transportation from farm to market will contribute immeasurably to the general welfare of the entire population. The farmer is the food producer for the world, and whatever will afford him the easiest and least expensive access to the consumer will promote the comfort and happiness of all. Good roads will result in better churches, better schools, better homes, and a better citizenship. They increase the attractiveness of rural life, and they operate to relieve the overcrowded conditions which disfigure the congested centers of population. [Applause.]

It is not assumed, of course, that the measure which is now under consideration by the House is the perfection of human wisdom on the subject of good-road construction in the United States. We are simply entering upon an experiment which may be continued indefinitely if profitable or abandoned summarily if unsatisfactory. We are devoting $220,000,000 annually to our Army and Navy to render certain the discomfiture of any foe who may assail us. Surely we can apply one-tenth of that sum to our country highways to multiply the conveniences of our rural population. The appropriations which are contemplated are so modest as to be negligible when our almost inconceivable national wealth is considered, but I am for the bill as drafted because it does make an intelligent start in the direction of better roads. [Applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read in my time a letter from Hon. Wilmer Atkinson, editor of the Farm Journal, which has one of the largest circulations among the people of our country of any periodical published in America.

PHILADELPHIA, April 26, 1912.

Hon. WILLIAM SULZER.

DEAR SIR: I beg to have your earnest consideration of the following:

The Forty-seventh Congress established by law that "A publisher may mail sample copies of each issue at second-class rates." There was no limit placed upon the issue of sample copies, for it was believed then, as it is true now, that the circulation of the public press ought to be encouraged.

This law has never been repealed by Congress, but the Post Office Department adopted a rule annulling the law, first limiting the sample copies to one-half, and later cutting them down to 10 per cent of the regular issues.

Now, for the first time, it is seriously proposed by Congress to limit the issue of sample copies to accord with the department-made law of 10 per cent of regular issues. This now appears in Mr. DODDS'S amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill in the House, in reference to publications "issued by benevolent or fraternal society orders or by trades-unions, strictly professional, literary, historic, or scientific societies," etc., as appears on page 5413 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 22.

Clearly, all these classes of publications will justly complain of the 10 per cent restriction, and the inevitable next step will be to extend the limitation to all publications of every class. The amendment is thus an entering wedge for a reactionary measure.

Let me say in all earnestness that such a restriction is a monopoly breeder, and no better evidence of this can be afforded than that many of the old and firmly established publications are not unwilling to have the restriction made because new papers can not be as successfully established, except by those of large capital, without the same sample-copy privilege which built up the old-established papers, they want the field kept clear.

Personally, our paper, being long established, is not concerned in the matter; but every new paper started and to be started is and will be deeply interested.

It does not become the Sixty-third Congress, elected largely on the antimonopoly issue, thus to establish a monopoly breeder such as this.

I therefore appeal to you in the matter, and trust the appeal will not be in vain, feeling assured that it is more serious than you have thought.

A progressive and enlightened Republican Government ought to place no restrictions whatever upon the circulation of a free press, but, on the other hand, should encourage and foster it in every legitimate way.

The Dodds amendments ought to pass, with the 10 per cent restriction omitted.

Believe me, very truly, yours, WILMER ATKINSON.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, there are two amendments to the Post Office appropriation bill authorized by the special rule which we have adopted by an overwhelming majority vote that meet my enthusiastic approval and support. One is the Shackleford amendment, which provides Government aid and encouragement to better rural-route roads of the United States. Of this I shall say only a few words, for I know others are preparted to discuss it more fully and intelligently than I. But I do want to here proclaim my support of this plan for several reasons. It will encourage good road building and good road maintenance. It will broadcast Government aid into most important public benefit to every generally populated section of the country. It will help farmers everywhere to the better roads to their markets, which they deserve. It will return some of the revenues which country people pay into the National Treasury to their direct and substantial benefit. It will compel the city man who uses country roads to help pay the expenses of keeping them in repair. And it will prove to the country that this Congress is willing to take a step in the direction of helping the millions who help themselves rather than spend all of its income from the people in preparations for wars that we all hope may never come, in rivers and harbors that directly benefit only a comparatively few, and in other avenues of endeavor that make for national glory rather than common weal. So much for that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I come to that feature of the bill which I consider vastly more important than any consideration that the House will have in connection therewith. It is the amendment which I shall offer relative to the publication of the names of the editors or owners or stockholders or security holders of the newspapers and periodicals of the country before they can be admitted to the United States mail under second-class privileges. And just here I want to read you the amendment to the amendment which I am going to offer.

That it shall be unlawful for any person, association, or corporation to enter or deposit, or to have entered or deposited, into the mails of the United States any newspaper, magazine, or other periodical publication of like kind, unless such publication shall have plainly printed in a conspicuous place therein the name or names of the managing editor or managing editors, the name or names of the publisher or publishers, and the name or names of the owner or owners, including the name or names of the owner or owners of stock, bonds, or other securities to the amount of $500 or more, which have been issued or sold by the said person, association, or corporation owning or controlling such publication, and which may be outstanding. Also all editorial or other reading matter published in any circulating periodical for which money or other consideration is accepted by the publisher or publishers shall be plainly marked "advertisement" or be signed by the name or names of the person or persons in whose interest or interests such article is published. Any person, association, or corporation that shall so enter or deposit or have entered or deposited in the mails of the United States any such newspaper, magazine, or periodical publication of like kind in violation of the foregoing provisions shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be fined in any sum not less than $100 nor more than $1,000 for each offense.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. May I ask the gentleman why limit the amount to $500? Why not publish the name of every stockholder?

Mr. BARNHART. I had it so in my original amendment, but the Committee on Rules was led, and probably justly so, to believe that some newspaper publications have large amounts of stock owned by many small stockholders in 5, 10, 20, and up to a few hundred dollar amounts, as in communities where the public wanted to establish a newspaper by stock-company method, and in such instances it might be a great burden to the publication, on account of space necessary, to have such a great list of names published every issue. I do not think there is special merit in it, but inasmuch as it is reported this way I must confine myself to the amendment or it will be subject to a point of order. It is due both to honest journalism and to the public.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. I will.

Mr. ALLEN. I am in hearty sympathy with the spirit of the amendment, but it is contemplated, as I understand it, by this amendment that in the daily newspapers this publication is to be made daily?

Mr. BARNHART. It is.

Mr. ALLEN. Would the gentleman be willing to agree to an amendment that would make the publication weekly instead of daily, as it seems that would answer every purpose that the law which the gentleman seeks to enact would accomplish?

Mr. BARNHART. I thank the gentleman from Ohio for his interrogatory. I believe that the purpose of this amendment, and I know, in fact, that is my intention and the intention of those who are interested in it, to lay conveniently before every reader of every newspaper or periodical or publication of any kind ready reference as to its ownership and what probably inspires its editorial policy. Of course it would be a vast improvement over what we now have to have this information published weekly, and I concede that to some newspaper publications it may be a burden to publish oftener, but I submit to you that in nonpareil you can publish from 40 to 60 names to the column inch, and there are not very many newspapers in the country that would have enough names of owners to take up any considerable amount of space, because you can readily see that several hundred names can be put in a space of a few inches.

Now, then, in further answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ALLEN], the purpose of the amendment, as I said, is to enable the reading public everywhere to know the inspiration for the editorial sentiment which they are reading. And I am inclined to believe, in fact I will say, that I would not oppose such an amendment, and if the House decides to adopt it, it will be all right with me.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BARNHART. I will; but I have only 20 minutes to present some important things which I wish to say.

Mr. MANN. Then I do not wish to take the gentleman's time if he has only 20 minutes. I will try to get the information later.

Mr. BARNHART. I may be able to get an extension of time.

This amendment, I hope, will explain itself fully, for I put it in the plainest English at my command. It means that hereafter all periodical publications, of whatsoever kind, shall carry the names of editors, publishers, and owners, including all holders of securities therein, printed on a conspicuous page, in every issue, before the same can be lawfully admitted to the mails for circulation, and that violators of the act shall be fined for each offense not less than $100 nor more than $1,000.

Journalism of to-day is too largely under unjust suspicion of being controlled by evil influences, and this is but the result of many newspapers and magazines parading in such a way as to make themselves appear to be anonymous publications. This, in the very nature of things, not only invites question of their editorial motives, by reason of their veiled management, but it subjects the press generally to the unfair aspersion that corrupt or selfish interests dominate the editorial sentiment of the day.

And there is just cause for apprehension that some publications "cover up" their real purposes. For instance, I recall that a few years ago a street railway magnate secured majority ownership in two leading newspapers in a great western city, and thereby created disastrous public opinion and scandalized journalism. These papers, under this management, attempted to make and unmake city officials in the interest of the owner's railway investments rather than in the interest of public welfare. And they succeeded to such an extent that the design to mislead public opinion for the profit of the mercenary owner was accomplished, and then he threw off the mask and sold his newspaper holdings in an open transaction. Of course the public was amazed that it had been taking its inspiration from editorials dictated by the very interest that wanted a more profitable franchise and got it, but the horse was then already stolen and locking the door was a lost cause.

Charges are frequently heard that other big publications of the country are not infrequently under influences like I have just cited, and if these be true the public should know it before it is too late, and if not the editors and owners should have the benefit of the vindication which the publicity of ownership and editorship would give them. We have seen or heard of instances in many cities in our country where corrupt politicians or corrupt business interests have had proprietary and editorial control of the molds of public opinion. And we know that many editorials have large influence for evil which would be harmless if the real authorship were fully known to those who read them.

Mr. LEVER. Would the gentleman in that connection object to being a little more specific as to the charges suggested and name some of the papers?

Mr. BARNHART. On account of my loyalty to editorial ethics I hesitate to charge anything specific, but I might say to the gentleman that I refer especially to the fact that all of us have been hearing rumors for years, and especially of late, that so-called "big business" of the country is controlling newspapers and magazines. There are rumors afloat, as all of you have doubtless heard, for instance, that the Harvester Trust, an admitted bane of commercial freedom, is one of them and controls certain New York and other big city publications. I hear it controls a certain Chicago publication.

Mr. MANN. I want to say that I do not think the gentleman knows it.

Mr. BARNHART. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] if the McCormicks do not own the Chicago Tribune?

Mr. MANN. Not the same McCormicks that are interested in the Harvester Co.

Mr. BARNHART. Are they not of the same family?

Mr. MANN. Not the same family.

Mr. BARNHART. My information has been, and is now, that members of the same family that is the principal stockholder in the International Harvester Trust controls the Chicago Tribune. If that is not true I stand corrected, as I want to be eminently fair.

Mr. MANN. That certainly is not true.

Mr. BARNHART. It is also reported that Mr. Perkins, the head of the Harvester Trust and owner of Steel Trust stock, owns the New York Mail and other publications as "silent partner." That is, such newspapers have issued bonds and Mr. Perkins holds the majority of those bonds and dictates the policy of the publications on behalf of the trusts in which he is interested and in behalf of an alleged reform candidate for the Presidency of the United States.

And it is also a matter of common rumor that many other metropolitan publications are owned and controlled by cerporate interests and conducted on selfish lines the ownership of which is unknown to the reading public.

This is a baneful condition which, in justice to honest journalism and a deserving public, ought to be corrected. If there be circulating mediums which bear false witness, let the public know of their inspiration. If there be editors who sell their souls for a mess of pottage, their identity should be known. And if there be newspapers or other periodicals published to promote corrupt practices or prey upon the credulity of the people by covertly upholding avarice and greed, let the light of publicity shine fully upon them.

This amendment, if enacted into law, will not cost the people anything, but will conserve honesty and public confidence in one of the greatest educational factors in the world. I would not lay one straw in the way of full and free discussion by the public prints. Instead, I would encourage earnest and responsible discussion of men and measures pertaining to public affairs. But I would have the reading public know who it is and what it is that fills editorial columns, and when this is known the reliability of the editorial opinion disseminated may be easily and safely measured.

It is one of the principles of journalism, taught in every editorial den in the country, that the first thing a newspaper man ought to learn is that he should be fair even in reporting a dog fight.

But newspaper reporters, who work day and night, are not always permitted to write what they find. Instead, they are told by some newspaper owner how to frame their news articles to help him or his friends. I believe every newspaper man ought to be fair and just and out in the open. Why, not long since, after the death of a dog, one of the most faithful and companionable with which I ever associated, I wrote a newspaper tribute to his memory and published it over my own signature.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a request?

Mr. BARNHART. Briefly.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman refers to an article on the subject of dogs. I am very much interested in all literature of that kind, particularly since we have the dog tax down in Kentucky, and I would like to ask unanimous consent that the article to which the gentleman refers may be printed in the RECORD as a part of his remarks.

Mr. BARNHART. I do not object to doing so, as dog literature seems to be quite popular these days, especially "houn' dawg" classics, and I will insert the same at the conclusion of my remarks. [Applause.]

But, returning to my subject, it is my profound conviction that notwithstanding the unfailing charm of the living voice in the pulpit or in the school the most useful man in the community is the good editor. The printed page is ephemeral. Yesterday's book logic or sermon may be already forgotten, but the journal of publicity has the cumulative effect from repetition day after day, week after week, or month after month. It reaches a wider circle than can be brought within sound of the living voice. And just at this age of the world, when the individual instructor is doing so well that he is momentarily at a loss what to do next, the circulating periodical should be building up public confidence in the efforts of men toward better things, rather than prostituting its high calling to harmful or mercenary ends. I pity the man at the head of a newspaper who does not feel the absorbing sense of honesty and responsibility as he thinks for the people, few or many, who read his words. But there is here and there one of such discrediting his high calling, and his contemporaries are all more or less compromised by an impostor in their ranks.

Right here, however, I want to protest against the indiscriminate censure of newspapers as such. Editors are only men, and like preachers and teachers and lawyers and doctors and other people, they sometimes make mistakes or fall short of the demands of the occasion. They may not always interpret duty aright in emergencies, for decisions must often be made hastily in order to meet prompt publicity demands; and they may not interpret duty as this or that impulsive enthusiast or guilt-laden culprit would decree. They may sometimes adopt what seem to be questionable methods of arriving at effective discharge of duty, and they may even insist that "vinegar never catches flies," and that men and communities are led rather than driven to right conclusions. But if left to their own sense of duty, untrammeled by dictation based on selfish design, they will not go far wrong, for they know better than the unsophisticated that the newspaper which panders to vice or corruption is a despised deserter in the face of high public duty, while the one that puts conscience above the cash register builds mightily for substantial triumph; and as between disgrace and success, the great majority of men strive for the latter if environment will only permit. [Applause.]

The best editors who ever lived and wielded pens in this country have been unjustly and harshly criticized. But that is only in accordance with common human nature.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. For a brief question I will.

Mr. COX of Ohio. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's amendment, and as a newspaper man myself I would like to submit the question whether or not there is not full propriety in the public being critical of newspaper editors, because in large part the editorial writer gives most of his time to criticizing things himself?

Mr. BARNHART. Assuredly so; and therefore, while the good editor will never be free from criticism, but can be made free from unjust accusations of being controlled by corrupt proprietary interests if this law is enacted, and the bad editor will be exposed to public view by the same process of publicity, it can not reasonably be expected that the enactment of this bill into law will be a cure-all for the evils that beset journalism. But I do believe that it will shield the great army of honest publicists from unjust suspicion which occasional impostors in the editorial profession induce; it will protect the reading public from deception by covert agencies of evil; and it will put journalism on the high plane of reliability and respectability which it ought to occupy as the greatest educational benefactor in the world.

Someone has said:

Give me the religious training of a child until it is 12 years of age and my doctrine will be its faith forever.

Show me the teachings of the home or generally read newspaper of any land and I will read therefrom the general policy of that people as accurately as though it were written on tables of stone. Hence if we would have wholesome public sentiment we must have circulating literature free from defilement, and I insist that it is hazardous to trust this requisite of well-being to anonymous journalism possibilities, that are sure to invite dark-lantern adventurers.

The editorial profession wants to stand up clean-handed and fair-minded and look full responsibility squarely in the face, but it can not do so efficiently with a veiled character assassin or a disguised agent of pelf here and there discrediting journalism by betraying public confidence. For this reason, Mr. Chairman, I believe that every honest editor and every deserving periodical reader in our country will approve this method of compelling all editors and publishers to stand out in the broad sunlight of day. The reading public which pays for editorial enlightenment is entitled to know who's who in journalism before it decides what's what. [Applause.]

FAREWELL TO "BOB."

EDITOR ROCHESTER SENTINEL:

A message from home to-day stating that old "Bob," deaf and decrepit, but the family pet and pride and protector for 15 years, had died halted interest in all else with me save memory of the past; and, while he was only a fox terrier dog, no affair of state, nor burst of congressional eloquence, nor dream of future glory attracts my attention, and I think and think and think.

"You were just a dog, 'Bob,' but you were a 'thoroughbred' in your class; and if there ever was a faithful, alert, trustworthy, loyal, mind-your-own-business, self-respecting, gentleman dog, you were this illustrious 'dogality.' From the evening you came from Chicago a plump, little puppy to the hour of your death, the result of paralysis, superinduced by fighting two intruding Peru mongrels at the same time, you were the trusted watchman of our home, the devoted 'pal' of the children, and my rollicking 'chum.' You could do stunts like the boys on land, in air, or in water; you showed many a pesky rat and prowling cat that life was not worth living; and the body scars you carried to your grave were so many badges of honor, for you never showed fear and never fought a dog smaller than yourself. No boy ever 'soaked' you or one of your young masters and 'got away with it' without being dog bitten; no man ever violently attacked you who didn't cry, 'Call off your dog'; and no one ever approached your home at an unseemly hour or in uncommon manner except to hear warning of your strenuous vigil or meet you face to face on the danger line of intrusion. Of course you occasionally erred in judgment. As I remember, you frightened Joe King into short growth, and you bit Uncle Adam Mow and Mike Henry and Huston Black and numerous other good men who called on friendly mission and found only you at home, and you were not sociable with other people. But your mistakes were due to your loyalty to me and mine, and I'm homesick and heartsick in sorrow because I must bid you, game and companionable old fellow, this everlasting farewell. No friend ever stood with us so firmly and so unselfishly as you, and all you asked in return was to have the door opened 40 or 50 times a day that you might rush out and chase roving curs away and an occasional bone or some crumbs from the table.

"And so your memory shall be cherished with us as long as time lasts. Your constancy, your self-denial, and your admirable activity in the everyday affairs of the youth about you, as they grew from childhood to man's estate, have been a help to me beyond expression, and if any fellow citizen ever mistakenly or maliciously classes me with your kind, I hope he may compare me with you, 'Bob.'"

HENRY A. BARNHART.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 24, 1912.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, one of the daily papers of this city, namely, the Washington Times, contained an editorial recently on the Shackleford road bill entitled "Dirt-road statesmanship." In this editorial it charged that a "select company" of Members of this House, imbued with "dirt-road patriotism," have united in an attempt to raid the Treasury in order to secure their reelection to Congress. I plead guilty to being one of the "select company," so called, who have united with the gentleman from Missouri in promoting this measure. While I resent the imputation which the Times seeks to cast upon our motives, I have no objection to being called a "dirt-road patriot." Indeed, I thank the Times for its indictment. I was born and reared and still live in a dirt-road country. I have not traveled in all of the States of the Union, but I have seen enough of the country to convince me that the "dirt-road statesmen" are in a majority in this body. [Applause.] If all of them have nerve enough to stand by their "raisin'," there is no doubt about this measure passing by a large majority. [Applause.] As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] intimated the other day, if this measure had been designed only to make automobile roads better, it would doubtless have been spared the satire of this great newspaper. [Applause.]

The editor evidently expected to cast ridicule upon the advocates of this measure, but I feel that he has really done us a great favor, and that he has signally honored the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], as he deserves to be honored. [Applause.]

I see the gentleman from Missouri is present. Sir, this is an opportunity I long have sought. [Laughter.] In the name of the great common people of this country I salute you, sir, as the "Grand Mogul of the Knights of the Dirt Road." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LANGLEY. Not just now. Ours is the only real, royal, fraternal, patriotic organization in the world [applause], and to my brother sir knight and exalted ruler, let me say that Democrat though you are, I would rather serve under you as an humble doorkeeper in the temple of our noble order than to dwell in the tents of wickedness in Syracuse, Philadelphia, or Chicago. [Applause.]

Mr. BOWMAN. Is not one of the purposes of this bill to put the gentlemen of that class in a higher one—in the class of the macadam road and the telford road and the brick road?

Mr. LANGLEY. I hope it may do so.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the Shackleford bill, and I am entirely willing to admit that one of the reasons that I am in favor of it is that I am acting in obedience to the wishes of a great majority of the people whom I represent. I know that when some of us, disregarding the advice of our leaders, dare to vote for measures that they oppose but that the people of our districts favor, we are twitted with the charge of demagoguery and of appealing to the "bleachers" and to the "crowds in the courthouse yards," and things of that kind. Such arguments as these, if they may be dignified by that term, have no terrors for me. I have heard so much of them lately and have heard the people express their resentment of them so frequently that I am sometimes almost inclined to believe that if some of our leaders had in the recent past resorted to them a little less and had been a little more responsive to some of the just demands of the people we might have had on this side of the Chamber a more respectable representation, in point of numbers, than we have to-day. [Applause.] And unless some of them heed the voice of the people a little more than they have been doing the country may be compelled to undergo, alarming as the prospect may be, the pangs of another Democratic national administration. I hope that such is not to be our fate, but how can we plain "dirt-road statesmen" on this side of the House help feeling discouraged over the outlook when our leaders are flying at each others throats?

What else can we expect but Democratic victory when Republicans like the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], who has been honored by the minority with a place upon the great Committee on Rules, will stand up here and harangue the House for half an hour with a tirade of unbridled bitterness and vituperation against one of the foremost citizens of the Republic—one of the great leaders of our party—who has been twice honored with the exalted position of head of the Nation and who has been lately given an overwhelming vote of confidence by the Republicans of such magnificent Republican Commonwealths as Kansas, Illinois, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Maine, Oregon, and Nebraska? If there ever was any doubt as to the intent and probable political effect of the gentleman's utterances, it was entirely dispelled by the prolonged applause on the Democratic side with which he was frequently greeted.

Mr. Chairman, I have only been a member of this House for a comparatively short time, and I hesitate to place myself in the attitude of seeking to criticize the course of Members who have served longer than I have or question what appears to be a long-established custom; but it seems to me that gentlemen are too prone, after they have gotten the worst of it on the stump or in the press, to rush into this House and, taking advantage of their privileges as a Member, to burden the House and the country with their grievances. I do not believe that such a course is within the scope of our duty as Representatives, and I hope to see the day come when the practice will cease.

I have no part in the quarrel between the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and the ex-President, as might be inferred from what I have said; nor in any other quarrel between Republicans. We have too many already. Neither have I arisen for the purpose of undertaking to defend the ex-President. He can attend to that himself. But, if I correctly recall the facts, the gentleman from Kansas began the controversy, and I can not see where he has any just cause of complaint against Col. Roosevelt for talking back at him. The gentleman from Kansas complains because Col. Roosevelt went out into his territory, where he says his political fortunes were at stake, for the purpose of assailing him. He apparently forgets that while Col. Roosevelt's political fortunes are national, his are only local. The gentleman was just as guilty of invading the territory where Col. Roosevelt's political fortunes were at stake when he went up into New Hampshire to attack him as the colonel was in making his reply in Kansas.

Mr. Chairman, there are thousands of men in my district who are just as loyal and just as patriotic Republicans as any who have ever set foot on the soil of Kansas, who believe in the integrity and patriotism of Theodore Roosevelt and who want him nominated for the Presidency [applause], and I feel that I would be recreant to my duty to them if I failed to answer what the gentleman has said.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What is the answer?

Mr. LANGLEY. If the gentleman will wait, I will touch upon that. I may say further, that there are still other thousands of Republicans in my district, of the same stalwart kind, who believe that the Republican Party owes President Taft an indorsement of his administration by a renomination for the Presidency; but I do not believe that there is a single one of them who would indulge in the character of criticism which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] indulged in, nor do I believe that they would indorse it, from whatever source it might emanate.

The gentleman asks me what the answer is to what he said. I have not the time to go into that in detail, nor would I desire to do so if I had the time. I did not take the floor for that purpose. Lest what I have said may be misconstrued, let me say that I would be just as ready to defend our President or any other great leader of our party if he were assailed on this floor as Col. Roosevelt has been assailed by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. Chairman, I propose to heartily support the nominee of the Chicago convention, whoever he may be [applause on the Republican side], and I shall say nothing now or hereafter which would preclude me from doing so honorably. In view of what the gentleman said in his speech Monday, it may well be doubted whether he would support the nominee of the Chicago convention if that nominee should happen to be Col. Roosevelt. I may be mistaken about it; I hope I am. If the gentleman had not declined to yield when he had the floor, I should have asked him that question then. If he desires to make his position clear upon it now, I shall be glad to yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will make my position clear to the people of Kansas and to the people of my district. I think I owe nothing to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not think the gentleman does, either; nor do I think he owed it to the House the other day to take its time for half an hour on a purely personal matter like that.

The gentleman complains because of the action of Col. Roosevelt, while he was President, in consenting to the merger of the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co. with the United States Steel Corporation. I believe the gentleman was a Republican Member of the House of Representatives at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I believe the gentleman from New Jersey was to yield me 15 minutes.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman concludes his discussion of a former President of the United States and the political fortunes of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] I will be glad to yield him 10 minutes in which to discuss this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman objects to what I am saying and desires me to confine the balance of my discussion to the bill, very well.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Then I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say—and I hope the gentleman from New Jersey will permit me under the limitation he has imposed in granting me additional time to say that much—that I had practically concluded all I had intended to say with reference to my friend from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], except to ask him one or two questions about his course now and heretofore on this merger matter, but I will not, in view of what the gentleman from New Jersey has said. In passing from the subject I want to say that I have genuine admiration for the ability of the gentleman from Kansas, and ever since my first acquaintance with him I have always held him in the highest personal esteem. I regret, however, that he lost his temper the other day to such an extent as to say what he did here upon the floor.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I beg leave to tell the gentleman that I did not lose my temper at all. I never was in better temper in my life. I simply gave dignified answer to a personal attack upon me in my own State by a man who knew that my political fortunes were at stake, as the gentleman from Kentucky says the ex-President's political fortunes are at stake in the country.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am finding no fault with the gentleman for defending himself out in Kansas as much as he pleases, and I know that he is fully able to do it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, returning to the road question. I desire to say that while the Shackleford bill does not go as far as I would have it go I shall give it my supoprt as being the best that can be accomplished in that direction now. I have never entertained any scruples as to the constitutionality of a measure which would appropriate directly out of the Federal Treasury money for the construction and improvement of public highways, and I would welcome the opportunity now to vote for such a measure. I believe, however, that the Shackleford bill, if enacted into law, will be the entering wedge to a more elaborate and effective plan of Federal aid, and I am glad to give it my support.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. KENDALL. I want to ask the gentleman if he has estimated the amount of money that will be required to meet the appropriations under this bill for the first year?

Mr. LANGLEY. I have not gone into the matter in that detail; no. It will not be many millions, however. But I am not worried about that so long as we get good roads. They will yield to the farmers many times what they cost. Under the provisions of this bill the State of Kentucky will receive ultimately more than $600,000 annually for this purpose, and I hope that every member of the Kentucky delegation will support it. If any of them do not, I shall be curious to hear the reasons for their action.

Upon what theory of constitutional government can those who support appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, public buildings, and other internal improvements contend that aid in the construction of public highways is not within the scope of the power and duty of Congress? How can they contend that it is constitutional to make appropriations for these other purposes, and yet that it is not constitutional to appropriate money for the improvement of our public highways? [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANGLEY. If the gentleman will give me a little more time I shall be glad to yield, provided he will confine his question to this bill and not mix it up with politics. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, since there seems to be applause when anyone asks why a distinction should be made as between our public highways and the rivers, I think it is time somebody called attention to the fact that the practical Federal ownership in the bed of the river has always been asserted. I think there is no phrase more familiar than that of Jefferson, because the dictionary writers have seen fit to adopt it as an illustration: "The bed of the Mississippi, therefore, belongs to the sovereign—the Nation." The gentleman should not attempt——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, is not the gentleman mistaken in his legal proposition? The bed of the river does not belong to the sovereign. It is the right of navigation.

Mr. KENDALL. Exclusively the right of navigation.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. That does not happen to be the fact.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman does not say that the title to the bed of the river is in the National Government.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. LANGLEY. If I had the time I would be very glad to, although the gentleman from New York declined to yield to me when he had the floor the other day.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. My recollection is that I yielded to almost everybody, and there were several talking at the same time.

Mr. LANGLEY. But the gentleman overlooked me. So far as the point raised by the gentleman from New Jersey as to the distinction between the relations of the Government to rivers and other highways is concerned, I think, as stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, that whatever distinction there may be does not affect the constitutional question involved. The Government of course has jurisdiction over all navigable rivers, but it has taken that jurisdiction under the authority of the Constitution—the same authority under which it has the power to extend the aid which we are now asking for the improvement of our highways. If I had the time, I think I could cite abundant precedents in the decisions of the courts to sustain that statement; but I can not discuss that now. I have only a few minutes remaining, and I hope that gentlemen will refrain from interrupting me further.

Mr. Chairman, hundreds of millions of dollars have been expended for the improvement of our rivers, and it has now become the permanent policy of Congress to apply a portion of our annual revenues to that object. I am glad such a policy has been adopted, although I fail to see the wisdom or justice of applying these appropriations to the larger streams before the smaller ones are given any aid. If there is to be any discrimination in this regard, it seems to me that it should be in favor of the rivers which have the lesser volume of water and are therefore in greater need of improvement.

The same reasons which justify the Federal Government in the improvement of our waterways apply with equal force to the improvement of our public highways. Indeed, I think the latter proposition has a prior claim upon the Government, because those who live convenient to our rivers have adequate means of transportation without Federal aid for a considerable portion of the year—an advantage which is not possessed by the great bulk of residents in inland sections because of their distance from river and railroad transportation.

But, aside from all this, the question of good roads is inseparably linked with the great problem of transportation—a problem of the most vital importance at this time to the whole country, and especially to the Southland. In the near future the two oceans will be united by the Panama Canal. As a result of this the way will be opened to the Pacific and to the markets that lie beyond, where we expect to get a far greater share than we do now of the world's commerce. The magnificent resources of the South await that consummation, which will undoubtedly bring to her people a greater degree of development than has ever been known in her history, and we must prepare for this new outlet to the products of our fields and forests and mines and factories. The solving of the great problem of ocean transportation by the building of the canal will not remove the only obstacle in the way of the South receiving its full share of these advantages. We must not only improve our rivers, so that our products may be transported upon them all the year around, but it is equally important that proper means of transportation be provided for the inland sections if they are to receive their share of the advantages which their money aided in creating.

I do not begrudge the more than four hundred millions of the people's money that will have been devoted to the construction of the great canal, but I do say that unless we complete the chain of transportation by the adequate improvement of our rivers and our public highways leading to and from inland sections, we will not have done our duty, but by our inaction we will have deprived them of that to which they are justly entitled.

I can not understand how any gentleman, representing that magnificent territory drained by more than 20,000 miles of navigable rivers flowing through the South, and who are interested likewise in the development of the inland sections lying beyond them, can withhold his support from this measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANGLEY. Just one more minute and I will close.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I yield two minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have heard gentlemen express the fear lately that there is a dangerous tendency in this country toward socialism and anarchy. I have such an abiding faith in the stalwart Americanism of our citizenship as to believe that they will never reach that degree of radicalism. What gentlemen mistake for such a tendency is merely the outcropping of the resentment which the masses of the people feel on account of the unequal distribution of the benefits of some of our national legislation. What these gentlemen need to fear is not the predominance of socialism and anarchy, but rather their own dethronement from power, so that there may be, not in name merely, but in fact and in truth, a real rule of the people. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. AYRES].

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, together with the other Members of the committee, I have been greatly edified by the spectacle of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] in his endeavor to wash some of the dirty linen of our opponents in public. We have set aside Monday for District day, Wednesday for Calendar Wednesday; now why would not it be a good idea to set aside Saturday morning during the rest of the campaign for laundry day? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman need that much time?

Mr. AYRES. Well, some of you gentlemen might use it to advantage.

Mr. Chairman, pretty nearly every class of citizens in the United States seem to want to dip their hands in the Federal Treasury and pull them out with an appropriation sticking to them. One session it is the shipowners who want subsidies for sailing their ships and carrying their freight, and then next session it is little towns of two or three hundred population who want $75,000 post-office buildings. If it is not one thing, it is another. Anybody who finds it hard to get a living wants a Government job, and anyone who finds that he can not accomplish any particular work he has in hand wants to turn it over to Uncle Sam to do for him. Last week I had a letter from a valued constituent, who said that it was no longer profitable to breed good horses in the State of New York now that betting on races was illegal, and if I wanted to immortalize my name I should at once introduce a bill to have the Federal Government breed horses on a large scale, so that horse lovers in the different States could have them cheap. Yesterday a telegram came from an enthusiast who thought that Uncle Sam should send enough revenue cutters or Dreadnoughts toward the Arctic regions to personally convoy each iceberg that got loose till it melted into the Gulf Stream, firing off blank cartridges during the night to warn off all ships in danger. In every part of this land of the free there are men or classes of men who do not want to do some kind of work they think ought to be done and so they want Uncle Sam to do it.

In many parts of our glorious country at the present time there are men or communities who have not good roads and who know they ought to have them, but they do not want to spend the money, and so—let Uncle Sam do it. And these communities get after their Congressmen and say, "We ought to have these roads, and if you are any good as Congressmen you will get them for us." And so the poor Congressmen, who know better all the time, come here and introduce bills and argue gravely that, having given the rural communities free postal carriers, it is now our duty to provide the roads for the carriers to travel on, or to keep them up. I tell you, gentlemen, it is not "conscience that doth make cowards of us all," but our constituents.

Fifteen years ago, when the Rural Free Delivery Service was proposed, it was talked of as a boon to the rural population, as a gift which would cost the rest of the country many millions. No one ever supposed the time would come when the country would be asked to pay for the privilege of making this annual gift.

What are the facts? For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, the Rural Delivery Service cost a little more than $37,000,000 and the total postal revenue that originated on these routes was just over $14,000,000. And now, what does this bill propose? That for the first year the United States shall pay for the privilege of using the roads the carriers travel on—$25 a mile for one class of macadam roads, $20 a mile for another class of roads, and $15 a mile for another and poorer class. It was estimated by one of the gentlemen in favor of the bill that the cost the first year would be $16,000,000. Now, the cost of constructing good macadam road varies from $3,000 to $15,000 per mile, according to the character of the soil, the grades, and the thickness and width of stone surface. It might be safe to say that the average cost is $5,000 per mile. The interest on an investment of that much is $300 per year, and it costs at least that amount to keep a macadam road in repair.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield for a short interruption?

Mr. AYRES. If it is a short interruption; I have not much time.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I inquired about the cost of the road in our section of the country, built under the direction of the State, and I find the cost was $11,800 a mile.

Mr. AYRES. That is the cost in the State of New York.

How many communities will be led to expend $5,000 a mile in order to secure a yearly rental of $25 a mile? We all know how these things go. If this bill should by any unfortunate chance become a law, the next year the gentlemen who now favor this bill would come in with an amendment asking $50 a mile on macadam roads and argue gravely that even that would not be Uncle Sam's rightful share to pay. And the next year they would come in with another amendment asking that 50 per cent of the upkeep of these roads be given them by Congress. And then after this had been in operation awhile another amendment would be tacked on which would show that long usage proved that it was the duty of Congress to keep up these roads and that if any accident happened to a traveler on account of their imperfect condition he should have a right for damages. If this bill shall pass, in 15 years the Federal Government will be paying a hundred million dollars a year on account of it.

Advocates of this bill have argued that inasmuch as the Post Office Department paid for the use of the railroads that it should therefore pay for the use of rural post roads. But the department does not pay for the use of the railroad right of way or the use of the rails. It pays the railroads for a service performed, for transporting the mails over the rails and right of way. And it now pays the rural carriers for a similar service, the transporting the mails over the rural roads. If the railroads came here with a bill like this and asked $15 per mile for any kind of rusty old track, and $20 per mile for fairly good standard-gauge track, and $25 a mile for first-class two-track road, and argued that if we paid them these bonuses it would be an incentive to them to improve their tracks, what gentlemen in this House would be the first to howl? If the department is to pay for keeping rural roads in shape, over which it is already paying to have the mails transported, just as it pays the railroads, why could not the superintendent of the Pennsylvania Railway come in here with equal justice and say, "We are thinking of putting in new ties and ballast between Philadelphia and Baltimore, and if you give us $25 a mile we will do it."

Aside from being absolutely wrong in principle the bill is full of minor imperfections.

It does not even provide that the sums the department is to pay for the use of the roads shall be spent in keeping the roads in repair.

It provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall decide what roads are to receive stated sums, which would make of the Agricultural Department a center of political favoritism.

It provides that the sums paid shall go into the keeping of officers in charge of roads. What would become of such payments in the case of toll roads? Would they go to road monopolies here and there?

We are all in favor of good roads. There is no more important subject before the American people to-day. But let us go at the problem in an honest and square fashion. Let each State that desires good roads build them for itself. That is good Democratic policy. We are awake to this matter in the State of New York, and we who live in that great State have just enough pride in our State to want to build our own roads. We do not ask your aid in our road building, and we do not want to pay for doing in any other State what it ought to do for itself. I commend to your consideration the following telegram from our State superintendent of highways, Hon. C. Gordon Reel:

Hon. STEVEN B. AYRES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Amount to be spent by State of New York, 1912 construction and maintenance, $26,307,581. Letter follows.

C. GORDON REEL,
Superintendent of State Highways.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time and ask unanimous consent to be allowed to extend my remarks with regard to the parcel post, and especially with regard to the international parcel post.

The CHAIRMAN. General leave has been already granted.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] was right, I am now proceeding to align myself with the minority of this House, but conscious of the rectitude of my position, entirely confident that it is not only rational, but soundly Democratic and soundly patriotic, I cheerfully take the hazard of such a position.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that there is a Member of this House who has a higher appreciation of the advantages of good roads than I have. Now and then for years I have shared humbly in the effort to arouse the people to a better understanding of the economic and social importance of good highways. I have worked and in a small way I have spent my own means in an effort to promote the good-roads movement. My interest in it can not be questioned.

I want to see the roads improved just as fast as the people who must pay for them can afford the expense of their construction.

I also want to see the best roads that can be built running through every neighborhood in each of the 48 States. This much it is proper to say, because an effort has been made—and, no doubt, will be made again—to create the impression that those who do not sympathize with this bill are against improved highways.

If the subdivisions of the Federal Government—the States and the counties—have any proper function whatever, it would seem to be the construction and maintenance of roads. If there is any reason for the existence of States and counties, certainly the maintenance of the means of transportation between counties and neighborhoods is an obligation, a responsibility, and one that should not be shunted off on the Federal Government.

This is a proposition to have the Federal Government assume those obligations.

Supporters of the measure seem to think that the Government of the United States is an association of individuals altogether different and apart from those who reside in their congressional districts. They seem to be under the impression that contributions from the Federal Treasury are not paid by the people themselves, but are drawn from some mysterious outside source or deposit. At least that is the impression that is sought to be made, that must be made if gentlemen are to reap the political advantage from this ill-considered measure that they have maneuvered for. I can not so understand it. I can not, to save me, separate the citizen who is a taxpayer in the counties and States from the citizen who pays taxes to the Federal Government. The vast expense of all our governments—National, State, and local—must be borne by the citizen. The question that should most concern him is an economical and wise administration of his public contributions. Whether it filters through the hands of Federal or State or local agents, he must pay, and what he ought to do is to see to it that his tax money goes to its allotted work with the least possible expense. Now, I believe that whatever is done through Federal agents is apt to be more expensively done than if handled by a local agent. I believe that when the public treasure is collected through a system of indirect taxation more is taken from the people than is absolutely necessary, and that is spent with less regard for their interests. That is one of the evils of the indirect or customs-tax system. People seem to think more of the dollars that they pay directly into the hands of the tax-gatherers than of the dollars that they pay by a concealed additional charge on the tobacco they use or the clothes they wear.

Pass this bill and customs taxes can never be reduced. All pretense of economy will be abandoned when a majority of this House says by its vote that they mean to commit the General Government to the policy of building highways, conducting a freight express business, and, ultimately, the ownership and operation of railways. It makes one skeptical as to the sincerity of those gentlemen who say they want a simpler and cheaper Government, but invariably vote for extravagances that compel higher and higher taxes.

I also oppose this measure because it is not needed to secure good roads. Where the people have the intelligence to understand their advantages and the energy to do something for themselves they are getting them.

Vast sums are now being spent for highway development. There is an enthusiastic and general movement in that direction which is most encouraging to every advocate of the policy of better highways. New York State, which great Commonwealth is too independent and proud to beg the Federal Government to do what she can do better for herself, and ought to do for herself, has, I understand, just finished the expenditure of $50,000,000 on her public roads and is about to undertake the further investment of fifty millions more in the extension of her highway system. Pennsylvania and other States have spent or are now spending proportionately large sums. It is, I am afraid, those States that are laggards in the discharge of their plain duty that are behind this measure. They seem to prefer mendicancy to independence.

I further oppose this bill because, in my opinion, it means increasing appropriations in the future by you, or by more complacent Members who will follow you here, and, finally, Federal jurisdiction over State roads. The tendency to concentrate power in the Federal Government is now almost resistless. Certainly we can not expect that the Federal power will not follow large Federal appropriations. Jefferson, who sought to magnify the importance of the States and to preserve local self-government, had the best of Hamilton in theory, but in practice, when associated with the temptation of large appropriations, it begins to appear that the latter will win. We are bartering away the dignity of the States and exchanging a great constitutional birthright for a Federal mess of pottage.

To me it appears perfectly plain that the States can not retain dignity and importance while they avoid all the responsibility of that position.

I also object to this bill because, although it will cost an enormous amount, it is wholly inadequate for the purposes for which it was designed. When you apply the maximum rental per mile to the whole of any particular rural postal delivery route it will not be discoverable. To spend $25 per mile per year will be, in my judgment, sheer and inexcusable waste. It will cost the General Government dear, but is not enough to tempt any locality to the development of a better road system. It would be a mere suggestion to the local authorities to apply for more, and would, I feel sure, lead to a complete abandonment of local or State effort.

Mr. Chairman, that, to me, is one of the most deplorable features of this bill. I believe it will paralyze the good-roads movement. I believe that no State not yet equipped with an admirable and excellent system of highways will undertake to do anything for itself, can be inspired to do anything for itself, because, when they turn their eyes toward Washington, they will see gentlemen here clamoring for appropriations out of the Federal Treasury to do for them locally what the obligation in honor and decency rests upon them to do for themselves.

Mr. MADDEN. There is not anything in the bill requiring the $25 to be expended on the roads.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I regret to say I have not even time to answer the gentleman, as I am trying to get in the major portion of my speech in the time allowed.

It will take more than $16,000,000 from the Federal Treasury the first year just for rental and would cost for the first inspection $750,000 and as much as $200,000 a year for each subsequent annual inspection.

Mr. Chairman, in that connection I submit a letter from the Director of the Office of Public Roads, a letter that I commend to the attention of the House. It is from the man of all men in the service of the Government who is best informed as to the consequences of the legislation that is proposed in this bill:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF PUBLIC ROADS,
Washington, D. C., April 22, 1912.

Hon. JAMES L. SLAYDEN,
United States House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SLAYDEN: Replying to your letters of April 19 and 22, I am pleased to submit to you the following estimate, which I believe it is reasonable to suppose the Government might be called upon to pay out as rentals on the 1st day of July, 1914, for the use of roads over which rural mail is transported. Taking the figures given in your letter, namely, 1,007,772 miles of rural routes and 164,399 miles of star routes, I note a total of 1,172,171 miles over which rural mails are transported.

After very careful consideration, I estimate that 5 per cent of this mileage would fall in class A, 10 per cent in class B, 70 per cent in class C, and 15 per cent would not fall under any classification. The annual rental, then, would be approximately as follows:

Total (996,300) miles	16,116,500

I notice that the only provision with respect to classification is that "Any question arising as to the proper classification of any road used for transporting rural mail shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture." It occurs to me that this language is broad enough to cover a complete classification of all of the road mileage involved.

In this connection I beg to call your attention to a statement which I gave the committee on April 6 with respect to the cost of classification:

"From my interpretation of the bill, it would make it mandatory on the Office of Public Roads to make a complete inspection the first year of all rural-delivery routes. If this is the case, we must assume that it would take an inspector at least as long to cover the delivery route as it does a rural carrier. There are now approximately 42,000 rural carriers, covering something over 1,000,000 miles of routes daily. It therefore seems to me that an inspector should cover an average of 400 miles per month, taking into account inclement weather and other adverse conditions. This would mean that in a period of eight months, which would allow time to collate and digest the information obtained, about 300 inspectors would be sufficient to inspect the approximately million miles of rural routes. Their salaries would be approximately $125 per month, and their expenses will be approximately $5 per day, or $150 per month.

"This would make a total estimate of $660,000 for the eight-month period. Of course, to this estimate must be added an adequate amount for chief inspector, assistants, and general office expenses, which I estimate at $50,000. It would probably not be far wrong to say that for the first year an appropriation of $710,000 would be sufficient. It would seem reasonable that the expense of inspection and classification in subsequent years would not be over 25 per cent of the amount estimated for the first year, and I therefore suggest that it would require subsequent yearly appropriation of about $180,000.

This statement was made on the supposition that there were 1,100,000 miles of rural free-delivery routes. With the increased mileage which you give us, it is easily seen that a complete classification of all the routes would call for an increase in expenditure over that shown in my statement to the committee. For the increased mileage which you have given us, I figure that the first classification would cost approximately $750,000 and that subsequent classifications would cost about $200,000 per annum.

Why should they, they will say, with bad reasoning, I grant you; why should they take money out of their State treasury?

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have not the time.

Why should they tax themselves on their land, they will say, overlooking the fact entirely that bills that are made in Washington they must also pay. Why should they tax themselves when they can send a Congressman to Washington who will devote his energies to getting appropriations out of the Federal Treasury, even though it may involve ultimately the abandonment of principles which they have stood for all their lives?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Just a word, to say that I will submit in connection with these remarks a letter from the Director of Public Roads that I commend to these gentlemen who want to know the facts that will embarrass them when they come out of this legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] use some of his time?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, although I am not going to discuss directly any of the provisions of the pending bill, I am going to discuss generally the use and abuse of the mail. It is perhaps an astounding fact, not generally recognized, that although we expended last year $237,000,000 in conducting the mail service, yet by means of that service probably more than $300,000,000 were transferred from the pockets of the industrious and honest people into the pockets of swindlers.

I have examined the report of the Chief Inspector of the Post Office Department in which, among other things, he says that the prosecutions under the statute against schemes to defraud by means of the Post Office establishment put out of business last year concerns which had obtained from the people during that year $77,000,000. And he complains because of the number of cases that can not be brought within the existing law for the reason that it requires proof of intent to defraud so strong that it must be based upon the case of a pure swindle, a pure fake, and in many cases there are schemes that are really fraudulent, but which you can not bring by ordinary proofs within that rule.

He cites the case of the prosecution of some persons who were selling stock in a wireless telegraph concern—The United States v. Wilson—and he cites the decision of the court, from which I will print an extract in the RECORD for your information, in which the court comments upon the fact that there is a borderland or twilight zone, so to speak, between the cases that are now within the provisions of the penal code and those which really ought to be punishable. And the chief inspector concludes this discussion of the subject by suggesting that there ought to be additional legislation to reach that kind of cases.

There was an article, and I will have it inserted in the RECORD, printed in the paper called the Postmaster's Advocate, giving these matters in detail—giving the extent of the operations, and they are truly on a surprisingly big scale. And there is one thing about this swindling through the Post Office establishment that we must recognize as a peculiarity, and that is that the people who are swindled, and I think anyone will recognize the fact, keep silent. They would rather suffer the loss than say anything about it. In commenting upon that the newspaper says:

It may be estimated within reason that these fraud manipulations exceed $150,000,000 annually. This enormous amount of money is taken from a class of people who can ill afford to lose it, being largely people on a salary, widows, orphans, school-teachers, ministers, and, in many instances, persons connected with the Army enjoying positions of life tenure. One of the most peculiar features of the fraud business is the disinclination on the part of the public to make complaint. The average person would rather forget the investment of the money than to have his neighbor know he had been bunkoed.

As I have said, many of those who have given this matter careful consideration believe that the frauds exceed very largely the total cost of the mail service in a year.

Now, just as a sample of what is occurring daily, I took two of the local papers from my district, and I notice that one editorial says that the town needs a hotel very badly, and that if one-fourth of the money that had been sent away by the people of that town for oil-well schemes, or bogus gold, silver, and copper mining schemes, and drainage schemes in Florida and elsewhere, had been kept at home they could have built a first-class hotel, which they badly needed. The other paper said that three men in that town during the last few days had been taken in by some get-rich-quick swindle that would have enabled them to finance the proposed new brick yard. They had discovered very valuable brick clay in the vicinity of the town and they wanted to start that enterprise.

Now, these are only two samples of the items you see in the newspapers from every part of the country, and it shows the magnitude of these losses.

Now, there has been—in the Northwest, especially—a movement of great value in the last few years toward the development of the country. They have organized commercial clubs in nearly every town, looking out for all the things that go to advance and make progress in the country, such things as building good roads, opening up land, and getting more people to cultivate the land. These commercial clubs and societies of public-spirited men have organized development leagues, and they are all anxious to build up their own sections.

To do so requires capital, and yet, while they are striving to build up the country by misuse of the postal service, money more than sufficient to float all the necessary and proper development schemes is being taken away and put in the pockets of swindlers. There is under prosecution now in the southern district of New York one case that I understand involves the swindling of the public to the tune of seven or eight million dollars by men who bear the honored names of Quincy and Hawthorne, who have conducted their operations chiefly among the well-to-do and wealthy people.

The task of so framing a law as to minimize this evil is a difficult one. I notice that in some States they have statutes against false and fraudulent advertising. They have one section of that kind in the penal code of the State of New York, making it a crime to advertise any article of merchandise by means of advertisements that are calculated to mislead and which contain falsehoods.

Based upon that theory, I have framed a bill—I introduced it some time ago, and it is now pending—looking toward a prevention of this evil, so far as it is practicable. That bill is short and simple. I have, in an informal way, consulted many of the officers concerned in the investigation of these postal frauds, or schemes to defraud, and they all seem to think that my bill would cover the ground that seems not now covered by existing law. The bill is as follows:

That whoever shall offer for sale or attempt to sell or dispose of, or aid in selling or disposing of, any real property, article of merchandise, or any stocks or bonds or other securities of any corporation or association, to any person or persons by means of advertisements or announcements in any newspaper, periodical, circular letter, or other publication intended for circulation through and deposited in or carried in the United States mails, in which advertisements or announcements appear any willfully false assertions of fact calculated to mislead concerning the quality, situation, or value of such real property, the assets, property, prospects, or financial conditions of such corporation or association, or concerning the quality, value, or method of production of such merchandise, shall be fined—

And so forth.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. That is proposed to be made a penal law? The gentleman's bill is only penal in its nature.

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. It does not provide that violations of it shall exclude persons from the use of the mail?

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, no; it does not affect the mailability of a periodical or publication at all, but reaches the person who secures the advertisement and has it inserted and thereby offers or aids in selling real estate, securities, or merchandise by means of a false advertisement calculated to mislead.

Mr. TOWNER. It makes the fact of advertising publicly, falsely, a crime?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; and it is modeled, I may say, partly after the provision of the penal code of New York relating to merchandise, and extends it to real estate and stocks and bonds and securities, and of course connects it with Federal authority by means of prohibiting its circulation in the mail.

Now, I have already commented on the extent of these frauds, and the difficulty there is in their prosecution, and the fact that the prosecuting officers who have to do with this matter have asked and recommended additional legislation. I will insert the charge of the court in the Wilson case, which indicates that clearly. Here it is:

But the judgment will not serve the purpose it should serve if it be regarded merely as inflicting punishment on these defendants. It ought to reach far beyond them and serve as a warning to all those speculators and adventurers who pose as men of business and affairs and carry on their operations in the borderland between legitimate undertakings and criminal schemes. It should bring home to them that misappropriating other peoples' moneys is not distinguished from larceny by designating it as a great corporate enterprise; that inducing hundreds of men and women throughout the country to part with hundreds of thousands of dollars for worthless securities calls for condemnation just as much as cheating in the sale of a single musical instrument or picture frame; that, broadly, there is no merit in wholesale knavery over cheap tricks or in fraudulent schemes in disguise over barefaced swindles, and, furthermore, that neither swindlers of high degree nor cheats of low station can employ with impunity the mails of the United States in aid of their fraudulent schemes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like, if the gentleman will permit, to ask him another question.

Mr. STEENERSON. Surely.

Mr. TOWNER. Does not the gentleman believe that in cases of that kind there ought to be a provision of law prohibiting the use of the mails more completely than it is now reached by present legislation?

Mr. STEENERSON. I certainly think that these frauds should be stopped. It seems to me a sad commentary on the postal service when, according to the judgment of the best-informed people, more money is transferred from the pockets of the honest and industrious to the pockets of swindlers in one year by means of the mail than we pay for the whole postal service.

Mr. TOWNER. Does not the gentleman believe that an effective punishment and remedy would be to prohibit them from the use of the mails?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes. But, of course, you can not do that without inflicting perhaps greater injury. The remedy might be worse than the disease. The nature of these swindles is such that we hear very little of them. I want to have this matter circulated as much as possible, and I want the public to be informed of what is going on. I certainly believe that if ever there was an emergency which would justify a rider on an appropriation bill the emergency that presents itself in regard to preventing swindling through the mails is such an emergency. But, of course, I hardly expect to get unanimous consent for the insertion of this penal provision on the appropriation bill. I want to bring it to the attention of the House because it is a matter of such great importance to the people.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Is the gentleman able to prepare and propose an amendment to this law or bill which he thinks would succeed in substantially stopping this kind of fraud which he has described in the country?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; I think I am, and I think I prepared it rightly. I have submitted it, not formally, but in an informal way, to the Assistant Attorney General for the Post Office Department and the prosecuting officer in the Department of Justice who deals with such things, and they both approved of my bill. By reading the decision of the United States circuit court in the wireless-telegraph case of United States v. Wilson and the report of the chief inspector, it will be readily seen that some such legislation is needed.

It takes a good deal of assumption on the part of any Member of this House to ask Congress to adopt a provision of this kind without previous consideration. I do not want to do that, but I want to call the attention of the Members to it, and perhaps before this session is over they may become convinced that this legislation ought to be enacted. The bill that I propose is very simple, in few words, and that is the comment that has been passed upon it by all to whom I have submitted it. I believe we would render the American people a very great service by enacting such a law.

This is not a matter of a few ignorant people being swindled. The people who are victims of these false advertisements are the intelligent and the well-informed people of the country as well as the people in ordinary and perhaps humbler walks of life. The men who write these advertisements are the most skilled men in the art of advertising, and it is a fine art in itself. When they are prosecuted and convicted, perhaps, in one field, they reappear in a new one. They have studied how to evade the law. If you talk with these inspectors who have gone into Mexico and South America to investigate bogus rubber plantations and bogus copper mines, you will find that they generally tell you that the same man who has started one of these schemes will reappear in an Alaska scheme or something of that kind. They have studied the criminal law more diligently than the prosecuting officers have ever studied it in order to find out how to write these advertisements and get around the law.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. The gentleman, some time ago, spoke of a concern in New York that swindled the public out of seven or eight million dollars, and he referred to the names "Hawthorne" and "Quincy" in connection with that concern. I wish to ask him if that is the concern which advertised to the public that it could beat the New York Stock Exchange in buying and selling stock.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think that is the very identical one. I will say this, that they have not been tried. They have only been indicted as yet, so I would not like to specify their first names.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Is that the concern that sent out a booklet explaining and defending its position?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; I believe it did; and I believe it showed great literary ability to deceive the public. Can there be anything more discouraging and demoralizing to the young who seek to rise in the world by honest industry and fidelity than to see men, moving in the highest social circles, roll in millions of wealth filched from the confiding public by means of false and dishonest advertising carried by the Government in the mails?

The evil is a serious menace to our progress and prosperity, and has been constantly on the increase, and calls for the united efforts of all good citizens to suppress it as far as possible. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The newspaper article is as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT PROTECTS THE INTERESTS OF CITIZENS.

CRUSADE AGAINST THE GET-RICH-QUICK SCHEMES.

The result of a year's crusade against the get-rich-quick schemers, who have been using the United States mails in the consummation of their nefarious schemes, has developed a distinct line of new criminals in American life. In an interview given out by Postmaster General Hitchcock in New York some time ago, when one of the big raids was made, he stated that it was estimated that the American public has been swindled out of at least $100,000,000 through illegitimate business channels during the past 10 years by the manipulations of this class of criminals. It develops as a result of the year's work that the Postmaster General was too modest in his statement.

The parties arrested during the past year by the officers of the Post Office Department, under Mr. Hitchcock's supervision, have obtained no less than $77,000,000. The schemes which they employed covered every possible phase of industry and business life, from the sale of a simple fake article of a medical character to a prodigious mining scheme well figured out on paper and existing in the mind of the promoter without the semblance of fact upon which to base their alluring literature.

Mr. Hitchcock's crusade last year has been a distinct help to the commercial miners of the country. Mankind obtains his living and transacts his business as a result of the exchange of the commodities of the sea and of the land. Those trade relations are carried on by means of that which is secured from the bowels of the earth, and any transactions of a fraudulent character which destroy the faith and confidence of the American people in commercial mining affect the material medium of exchange.

DESTROYS CONFIDENCE.

As a result fake mining schemes and other fraudulent enterprises operating through the mails have practically destroyed the confidence of the American people in investments of that character. Many times a commercial miner or a legitimate prospector is unable to find the means of developing a prospect without being compelled to make enormous concessions of stock to promoters and selling agents and, in addition thereto, paying commissions of from 40 to 60 per cent for the sale or purchase of stock to be used in the development of the prospect.

The same conditions apply to the development of land schemes throughout the country, as well as various commercial enterprises, such as the sale of wireless telegraph and other electrical appliances, preying upon the credulity of the people for the purpose of making tremendous stock sales without the slightest intent to develop a legitimate business enterprise.

OBTAINED $2,500,000 BY FRAUD.

One single fraud operator, or combination of operators, manipulating railroad bills of lading and acting as agents for insurance companies, was able to obtain $2,500,000 from foreign cotton buyers, and at the same time destroyed the entire credit and confidence in the medium of realizing upon the offering of cotton in the market. All of this was done through bogus bills of lading sent through the medium of the United States mails.

These wealthy fraud artists, as a rule, invest their money in legitimate enterprises, and many of them consequently become promoters of banks, owners of manufacturing plants, and other wealthy and influential organizations. Because of their position and high station in life, it is a difficult matter to convict them, as their resources appear to be almost unlimited. However, during the past year over half a regiment of these promoters were taken into custody by the United States Government, their business annihilated, and nearly 200 of them, convicted within six months, are serving their terms in the penitentiary. Among this number are some 8 or 10 millionaires. The Atlanta Penitentiary contains a colony of bright geniuses whose minds, if directed in legitimates business channels, would add luster to the commercial world.

FRAUD-ORDER POLICY.

Heretofore it has been the policy of the Post Office Department to utilize what is known as the "fraud order," directing the postmasters to refuse to deliver mail addressed to these illegitimate institutions. The order must be applicable to some special organization or individual, and immediately upon the issuance of the order the enterprising schemer reorganizes the same scheme under a new name, uses with a slight change practically the same literature, retains his old mailing list, and is doing business, in many cases, at the old stand. In the Post Office Department the records show numbers of instances in which these operators have done business in a number of cities throughout the country and have reorganized the same companies 8 or 10 times.

This crusade, which has been so vigorously pursued, has resulted in scattering a large number of the small operators who became frightened at the attitude of the Post Office Department in prosecuting the large and influential organizations. The result has been that these smaller people have been driven out of business entirely, or they have changed their names, locating in other cities, taking their mailing lists with them, and attempting to do business within a space of two or three months, taking a chance on the Post Office Department officers being unable to detect them within that ime.

FRAUD OPERATIONS ENORMOUS.

These fraud operations can hardly be estimated, they are so enormous. Some 2,000 complaints are received annually by the Post Office Department, but the limited corps of officers who are engaged in ferreting out these criminals enables the department to reach, even with a vigorous crusade, only some 500 of them per annum and attend to the other important routine business duties of the Postal Service. It may be estimated within reason that these fraud manipulations exceed $150,000,000 annually. This enormous amount of money is taken from a class of people who can ill afford to lose it, being largely people on a salary, widows, orphans, school-teachers, ministers, and in many instances persons connected with the Army enjoying positions of life tenure. One of the most peculiar features of the fraud business is the disinclination on the part of the public to make complaint. The average person would rather forget the investment of the money than to have his neighbor know he had been bunkoed.

CREDIT TO THE PUBLIC PRESS.

To the public press must be given a tremendous amount of credit for enabling Mr. Hitchcock to accomplish what he has during the past year. The publicity of the methods employed by these shrewd schemers has opened the eyes of the American people to such an extent that the officers of the Post Office Department report hundreds of fraud operators closing their places of business and leaving for parts unknown.

By stamping out the Mabray gang during the past year the postal officers feel that one of the most gigantic and best-organized bands of swindlers has been broken up. This band of thieves and gamblers, headed by John C. Mabray, made a business of organizing and promoting fake horse races, wrestling, boxing, and other athletic tournaments all over the country. It is believed that they got no less than $5,000,000 from the American public through such operations during the past few years.

The United Wireless was a typical stock scheme operating through the mails. About $6,000,000 was obtained by the people operating that scheme through the fraudulent statements which they made to the public that every dollar of stock sold was treasury stock, when, as a matter of fact, an infinitesimal portion of the proceeds of the sale of stock reached the treasury of the company, practically all of it going into the pockets of the promoters. In this case the United Wireless Co. organized a selling agency, to whom it paid an enormous commission to sell this stock, and it developed that the major portion of the stock in the selling agency was also held by the promoters of the former company.

MEDICAL FAKES CAUSE TROUBLE.

That element of fraud which causes the Post Office Department the greatest trouble is the medical fakers, who use the mails to an enormous extent in their professions of curing every possible character of disease. This class of human buzzards is the most contemptible of all, for they prey upon the weak-minded women, the diseases of the crippled and invalid, and filch from them practically the last dollar they possess, in the hope that perhaps this widely and liberally advertised remedy may give relief. These are difficult cases to prove in court, by reason of the fact that these medical fakers resort to lawyers who are well versed in medical jurisprudence and advise them just how far they can go with impunity with their literature without violating the law.

CAMPAIGN WILL BE A VIGOROUS ONE.

Although the prosecution of these cases has become an enormous tax on the time and talent of the inspection force of the Post Office Department, the same vigorous policy will be pursued in the future as in the past. Postmaster General Hitchcock has recommended that the entire investigation of this class of criminals be handled by the Department of Justice, but so long as it remains the duty of the department to handle these cases the campaign will be a vigorous one. It is predicted that this will be an even greater year in the annihilation of fraud artists throughout the country than the year which has just closed.

It has been said that the State governments have been derelict in handling these cases with vigor and protecting their citizenship. In this connection it must be remembered that no single State has the judiciary machinery to successfully handle and convict these criminals, as in a medium-sized case from 30 to 60 witnesses must be subpœnaed from 10 to 12 different States of the Union. And, in addition to this, the costs of a single case against the stronger and more influential class will amount to from $20,000 to $55,000, while the smaller class of cases is equally expensive in proportion to the volume of business transacted.

DIFFICULTY OF PROVING INTENT TO DEFRAUD.

If the postal officers were simply required to prove the mailing of the literature, the Post Office Department could easily stamp every fraud operator in America out of business within the period of a year. Instead, the time and talent of inspectors is taken in proving the intent to defraud, which the law provides must be shown clearly to the jury's satisfaction before a conviction can be made. In the proving of the intent the entire scope and organization of the business must be taken into consideration; the plant, the mine, the alleged deal, the land, the plantation, or the alleged place of business must be thoroughly examined; the books of the institution must be gone over in order that the case might be made to clearly exemplify the full intent of the operator to defraud the public in the intent and conception of the scheme. There has not been a single case presented by the present administration of the Post Office Department to the courts in which the defendants did not freely admit that the facts stated by them in their literature were in the main false and that the amounts of money received by them were procured as a result of their advertising. However, the inability of the Government to prove that it is the intent of the organizer or proprietor of the scheme to defraud the public in making such statements necessitates a charge to the jury for the dismissal of the case on the ground that a business man has a right within a reasonable limit to "puff" his business. In other words, it is difficult for the Government, under the present law requiring it to show the "intent" to defraud, to draw the line between absolute criminality and a business which is of a disreputable and questionable character, yet within the pale of the statute as interpreted by the Federal courts.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed on general principles to legislating through appropriation bills and think it unwise and a bad practice. I think it is much better that every legislative proposition have consideration in a separate bill, and am sure better legislation is secured in that manner. Here we have under consideration a bill making appropriations for the Post Office Department and a special rule presented that makes in order legislation not only proposed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, but propositions reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the Committee on Agriculture. While I have these views as to how legislation should be considered, I voted for the rule that makes in order upon the Post Office appropriation bill a number of provisions that otherwise would not be in order. I did so because I am in favor of several of the matters that will be presented and because I believed that unless the rule was adopted these propositions would not receive consideration during the present session. I am not going to discuss all the propositions that are contained in or that will be in order by reason of the rule. I will only discuss three of the matters that are presented, and those in a very brief manner. They are the parcel-post item, the taking over of the express companies by the Government, and the good-roads provision.

PARCEL POST.

I am in favor of a parcel-post service upon the rural routes, but not as proposed by this bill, which limits the service to the particular route where the package might be mailed. I shall favor an amendment providing that a package mailed on any route shall be carried to the town or city where the route originates and then transferred, to be carried to its destination upon any other rural route running from that point. Unless this is provided there is not much use in enacting anything; in other words, what is proposed by the bill would be far from satisfactory. The Postmaster General recommended that the service be provided for as I have suggested it ought to be, and I hope the House will vote to so amend the provision.

A rural parcel post such as I have indicated will be a great convenience and advantage to farmers and to people living in the country; it will also be of an advantage and convenience to merchants and others in the towns and cities. It will make it possible for the farmer to procure from the town articles of necessity by ordering same by telephone, and thus save a special trip. In almost every farming community to-day the rural telephone is general and nearly every farmhouse in well-settled communities is provided with a telephone. Such a parcel-post service as is contemplated, if we amend the provision as I have indicated, will not harm any merchant or person doing business in the towns, but, on the contrary, will be to their advantage.

The service could probably be conducted for a minimum charge of 5 cents, and for an 11-pound package, which is the weight limit for the international post, not to exceed 15 cents. Of course the question of definitely fixing the rate can only be determined after the service has been in operation for a time, and I want it understood that the rates I have proposed are only my opinion as to what the rates would probably be. Such a rural parcel-post service as I have proposed would produce considerable revenue, enabling the carriers to be paid additional compensation for the extra service, and thereby increase their salaries, which, considering what is required of them, are now too low. There would be some net revenue that would go to the Government, reducing to that extent the cost of operating the rural service, which now actually costs several millions of dollars annually. It is interesting to note the great growth of the Rural Free Delivery Service in the United States. It was first inaugurated about 15 years ago. In 1897 there was an appropriation made, and 82 routes were established, at a cost of less than $15,000. The pending Post Office appropriation bill carries an item for this service of $43,000,000, which means 43,000 routes and the same number of carriers. The estimated revenue from these routes now is less than $10,000,000, so it will probably cost not less than $30,000,000 to provide rural free delivery throughout the country for the coming fiscal year. No one questions the appropriation for this service, and it will continue to increase until the service extends still more generally than it does at present.

There is a strong demand in the country for a general parcel post, and much has been said and printed upon it, and this debate has added much value to the subject. The demand for a general parcel post is due largely to a desire to get a cheaper rate of transportation for small parcels and packages than is now charged by the express companies, and many think that a general parcel-post service would solve the problem, assuming that the Government could carry packages at a rate much cheaper than is now charged by the express companies. It can not be claimed that the carrying of packages can be considered the same as the carrying of ordinary mail, such as letters, papers, magazines, and other periodicals. It is the duty of the Government to provide the facilities for the carrying and the delivery of such mail, even at a loss, but not so with packages. It is not the function of the Government to engage in business at a loss to benefit one section of the country against another, and so in considering any parcel-post service we must keep in mind that the rates of charges must be sufficient to equal the cost to the Government. The interest of the people, as I have already stated, is cheaper rates, and not so much how they are to be gotten.

We have pending at this time several propositions that are proposed as a solution of the question. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] has introduced a bill providing for a general parcel-post system. The bill is as follows:

That the common weight limit of the domestic postal service of the United States is hereby increased to 11 pounds, the common limit of the Universal Postal Union, and that in the general business of the post office the 1-cent-an-ounce rate on general merchandise—fourth-class mail matter—be, and is hereby, reduced to the third-class rate, 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof.

That the rate on local letters or sealed parcels posted for delivery within the free-delivery services is hereby determined at 2 cents on parcels up to 4 ounces, 1 cent on each additional 2 ounces; at non-delivery offices, 1 cent for each 2 ounces.

That all mail matter collected and delivered within the different rural routes of the United States is hereby determined to be in one class with rates, door to door, between the different houses and places of business and the post office or post offices on each route as follows: On parcels up to one twenty-fourth of a cubic foot, or 1 by 6 by 12 inches in dimensions and up to 1 pound in weight, 1 cent; on larger parcels up to one-half a cubic foot, or 6 by 12 by 12 inches in dimensions and up to 11 pounds in weight, 5 cents; on larger parcels up to 1 cubic foot, 6 by 12 by 24 inches in dimensions and up to 25 pounds in weight, 10 cents. No parcel shall be over 6 feet in length, and in no case shall a carrier be obliged to transport a load of over 500 pounds.

That on all unregistered prepaid mail matter without declared value an indemnity up to $10 shall be paid by the Post Office Department for such actual loss or damage as may occur through the fault of the postal service, and this without extra charge. Certificates of posting shall be provided on demand. On registered parcels of declared value, and on which the fee for registration, insurance, and postage has been duly prepaid, the Post Office Department shall pay the full value of any direct loss or damage that may occur through the fault of the postal service. The fees for insurance and registration shall be as follows: For registration and insurance up to $50, 10 cents; for each additional $50, 2 cents. No claim for compensation will be admitted if not presented within one year after the parcel is posted.

It will be seen that this proposition proposes a flat rate, and the question of distance is not taken into consideration, and I am of the opinion that it would be of little benefit and would not accomplish what is desired or what its advocates claim for it.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] has introduced a bill which provides for a general parcel-post service of packages not exceeding 11 pounds in weight and provides that the rate of postage shall be determined by the distance the package is to be carried. As between this bill and the Sulzer bill, I would prefer it, because it would not be fair, from any standpoint, to carry packages a long distance for the same rate as a short distance. To illustrate: It would be unfair in my State to charge the same rate for a package going between points within the State, possibly only a few miles apart, that would be charged on a similar package from Boston to San Francisco. Either one rate would be too low or the other would be too high, and yet a flat rate, such as proposed by the Sulzer bill, would mean just that proposition; so, for that reason, if I were to support any general parcel-post measure, it would be the Anderson bill.

Another bill pending, dealing with the question of cheaper rates for carrying packages, is a bill introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. This bill proposes to fix the rates to be charged by express companies for the transportation of parcels and packages, the rates being based upon a zone or distance basis. The bill only contemplates the fixing of rates for the carrying of packages not exceeding 11 pounds in weight and valued at not more than $80. Section 1 of the bill is as follows:

That the rates hereinafter stated shall hereafter be the maximum rates to be applied either in first fixing rates by the express companies or in their correction or regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and no higher rates shall be charged and collected by express companies engaged in interstate commerce for receiving, transporting, and delivering packages or parcels not exceeding 11 pounds in weight and valued at not more than $80 between a point in one State, Territory, or District in the United States and another point in a different State, Territory, or District in the United States, whether the transportation occurs on the line of a single express company or on a through route or shipment operated by two or more connecting express companies:

Between any two points in the United States more than 2,000 miles apart, 12 cents per pound.

Between any two points not more than 2,000 miles apart, 10 cents per pound.

Between any two points not more than 1,200 miles apart, 7 cents per pound.

Between any two points not more than 800 miles apart, 5 cents per pound.

Between any two points not more than 600 miles apart, 4 cents per pound.

Between any two points not more than 250 miles apart, 2 cents per pound.

Provided, That no company shall be required to carry any package for less than 10 cents.

This proposition, I understand, has met with the support of all the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and has been favorably reported to the House by that committee. I would like to see it go further and fix express rates generally and without regard to the 11-pound limit. The enactment of the bill, as reported, would accomplish all that is proposed by the Sulzer or the Anderson bill, and at a much lower rate, in my opinion, for it has been demonstrated that a corporation can do business more economically and at much less cost than can the Government.

Another bill dealing with this subject is H. R. 23630, introduced by my colleague [Mr. MARTIN], and I think offers the best solution that has been proposed of this whole question. The bill is a short one, and in order that it may appear just what it proposes I will insert it in my remarks. The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act to regulate commerce, as amended June 18, 1910, is hereby amended by striking from the second line of the second paragraph thereof the words "express companies and."

SEC. 2. That each common carrier by rail subject to the act to regulate commerce and acts amendatory thereof shall, on and after the 1st day of July, 1913, provide and operate upon each passenger train operated by it a car for the transportation of property in small parcels and packages: Provided, That in special cases permission may be given by the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon application, to operate such cars in special trains operated at approximately the same speed as passenger trains.

SEC. 3. That on and after the said date the said railway common carriers shall receive and transport all express parcels and packages at reasonable rates, and in relation to the said express business shall be subject to the control, regulation, and direction of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the same extent, force, and effect as in relation to the transportation of freight or passengers.

SEC. 4. That each common carrier by rail providing cars for the transportation of property in small parcels and packages, as specified in section 2 hereof, shall file and publish rates for the transportation of such parcels and packages in the manner provided by section 6 of said act to regulate commerce, as amended June 18, 1910. No exclusive contract shall be made by any such carrier with any express company for such transportation of parcels or packages, but such transportation shall be furnished at the published rates to all persons alike.

SEC. 5. That such carriers by rail operating such cars shall establish through routes for the continuous transportation of property between various points on their lines and shall make all necessary and reasonable arrangements for the speedy transportation of such parcels and packages. Any such rail carrier engaging in the collection or delivery of such parcels or packages shall publish and file its charges for such service separately from its charges for rail transportation. Such rail carriers shall provide convenient and suitable facilities for the receipt and delivery of such parcels and packages at their stations as a portion of the rail transportation.

SEC. 6. That any carrier by rail, and any employee, director, or officer thereof, failing to provide and operate such cars, as hereinbefore provided, or failing to operate such suitable and convenient facilities for receipt and delivery of such parcels and packages at such stations, or making any exclusive contract with any person, partnership, or corporation for the use of such cars or facilities, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction thereof in any district court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such offense was committed, be subject to a fine of not to exceed $5,000 for each offense or imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term not exceeding three years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

There is another bill, also reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which contemplates the taking over by the Government of all the express companies in the United States. This is known as the Goeke bill and embodies the plan advocated by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS], who, by the way, has made a great study of the subject and has furnished the House with much valuable information dealing with the whole question. This is the proposition that will be offered to the pending bill, being in order under the special rule. If it should be adopted it would be the duty of the President, on the 1st day of July, 1913, to take possession of all the express companies and to employ them in conjunction with the postal service and to conduct a general express business. I see no occasion for this action, and when it is considered that the proposition contemplates that the property of the express companies shall be condemned and paid for by the Secretary of the Treasury, I do not see how anyone can consistently support it, when it may involve the expenditure of several millions of dollars. My understanding is that it is admitted that the capitalization of the express companies to-day is not less than $200,000,000. They have very little tangible property, and undoubtedly we would be required to pay a very large sum for acquiring their franchises or right to do business and whatever contracts they may have with the railroads and other common carriers of the country, but, in my judgment, we would really be paying for something that we do not need to purchase. If it is the desire of the Government to go into the express business, it can do so without purchasing the express companies, and the only reason that I can imagine for anyone giving this proposition support is to benefit those who may be fortunate enough to possess stock in some of the express companies that has a high value by reason of what it has earned as the result of the exorbitant charges which the express companies have been exacting for so many years. It is only recently that legislation has been enacted to regulate the charges of express companies, and I would consider it very opportune, if I was the owner of express stock, if this legislation could be enacted, in order that I could dispose of the stock to the Government before it begins to depreciate by reason of the reduction in rates through Federal and State legislation. The people are certainly not clamoring for us to buy the express companies, and, in addition to the great expense that would be involved, there must also be taken into consideration that it would mean taking over at once into the employ of the Government not less than 50,000 employees; and certainly there is too much involved to think of enacting legislation by an amendment to an appropriation bill that would mean so much as this. For that reason I shall oppose the provision when it is offered to the bill.

As before stated, the bill presented by my colleague [Mr. MARTIN] seems to me to offer a complete and practical solution of the question. He has demonstrated that he has given the subject much careful thought. Those who were fortunate enough to be present yesterday and hear his speech must be convinced that whatever is or is not done we ought not to adopt the Gocke proposition and acquire the express companies, and put the Government into doing the express business of the country. It was shown by Mr. MARTIN, I think conclusively, that the Goeke bill was reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce before that committee had concluded its consideration of the measure, and that the report was ordered with a bare quorum of the committee present, which consists of 21 members, only 8 out of the 11 members who were present voting for it. It must be taken into consideration that in adopting on an appropriation bill a measure as important as this, coming from another committee of the House, that the report ought not to be considered of much importance, in view of the manner in which this proposition was reported.

My colleague clearly demonstrated that to acquire the properties of the express companies would involve an expenditure as great as I have already indicated. He also clearly demonstrated that the express companies are now carrying their packages of 11 pounds at 50 cents, and that the average express distance of all packages is 196 miles, and that carrying such a package on a flat rate, as proposed by the Sulzer bill, would cost 88 cents. He further demonstrated that the present express company contracts result in paying the railroad companies about double what the service is normally worth, and that to condemn and appropriate those contracts would perpetuate these unreasonable rates and make it impossible to give the people the reductions to which they are fairly entitled. Another defect in the scheme of the Government acquiring the express companies, pointed out by him, is that there is nothing to prevent railroad companies and the express companies entering into new contracts and continuing the business in competition with the Government. After listening to much of the debate on this question, I am convinced that, considering the matter from every standpoint, there is no reason why the plan proposed by Mr. MARTIN can not be put into force, and that it will result in the more satisfactory service and at cheaper rates than can be had under any of the other plans proposed, and a general reduction in rates will operate beneficially to all the people alike.

It has been suggested, and there is a proposition in the rule that makes in order a provision for the appointment of a commission to study the whole question and make a report to Congress. It is possible that a commission constituted of high experts would be able to present a measure that would justify their appointment, but I would not favor such a commission unless we are unable to enact legislation that will solve the question immediately. The people are demanding relief, and we ought not to delay action unnecessarily, and yet we ought to hesitate before adopting a plan as complicated as it would be if we were to adopt a general parcel-post bill or a provision for acquiring the express companies.

GOOD ROADS.

The next matter that I want to discuss is the amendment that will be in order under the rule, which provides for Federal aid to roads by way of compensation for their use by the carriers in the Rural Free Delivery Service. The amendment is as follows:

That for the purposes of this act certain highways of the several States, and the civil subdivisions thereof, are classified as follows:

Class A shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide composed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam, graded, crowned, compacted, and maintained in such manner that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface, and all other roads having a road track not less than 9 feet wide of a construction equally smooth, firm, durable, and expensive, and continuously kept in proper repair. Class B shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface. Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times. That whenever the United States shall use any highway of any State, or civil subdivision thereof, which falls within classes A, B, or C, for the purpose of transporting rural mail, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile for highways of class A, $20 per annum per mile for highways of class B, and $15 per annum per mile for highways of class C. The United States shall not pay any compensation or toll for such use of such highways other than that provided for in this section, and shall pay no compensation whatever for the use of any highway not falling within classes A, B, or C. That any question arising as to the proper classification of any road used for transporting rural mail shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. That the compensation herein provided for shall be paid at the end of each fiscal year by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Postmaster General to the officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act.

The provisions of this paragraph shall go into effect on the 1st day of July, 1913.

It will be noted that the roads will be divided into three classes, and only such roads as come within these classes will receive any payment. This proposition is a substitute for 29 different bills that have been introduced and that are now pending in the House proposing Federal appropriations to be expended upon the roads of the country. The 29 Members who introduced bills got together and agreed upon this measure and presented a signed statement to the Committee on Agriculture, which committee favorably reported it. The statement presented is as follows:

To the Committee on Agriculture:

The undersigned Members, who have introduced bills on the subject of good roads, desiring to secure, as far as possible, harmony and unity of action among the friends of such legislation, have conferred, with a view to agreeing upon a bill. After careful consideration we have prepared and agreed upon the subjoined bill and requested Mr. SHACKLEFORD to introduce it on behalf of us all. We have further requested Mr. SHACKLEFORD to appear before you and respectfully bespeak for the bill early and favorable consideration.

Very respectfully,

EZEKIEL S. CANDLER, Mississippi; J. THOMAS HEFLIN, Alabama; THOS. L. RUBEY, Missouri; JOHN J. WHITACRE, Ohio; JOSEPH A. TAGGART, Kansas; JOSEPH HOWELL, Utah; JAMES P. BYRNES, South Carolina; KENNETH D. MCKELLAR, Tennessee; E. W. SAUNDERS, Virginia; WILLIAM B. FRANCIS, Ohio; RICHARD W. AUSTIN, Tennessee; SCOTT FERRIS, Oklahoma; D. R. ANTHONY, Jr., Kansas; GEORGE WHITE, Ohio; WALTER L. HENSLEY, Missouri; JAMES M. COX, Ohio; GEORGE A. NEELEY, Kansas; J. J. RUSSELL, Missouri; J. H. GOEKE, Ohio; H. D. FLOOD, Virginia; BURTON L. FRENCH, Idaho; T. T. ANSBERRY, Ohio; C. C. ANDERSON, Ohio; P. P. CAMPBELL, Kansas; S. F. PROUTY, Iowa; W. C. ADAMSON, Georgia; BIRD MCGUIRE, Oklahoma; D. W. SHACKLEFORD, Missouri.

A petition was circulated among the Members of the House asking the Committee on Rules to report a rule making it in order as an amendment to the pending bill, and I understand over 230 Members signed it, of which I am one, and in response to the petition the Committee on Rules incorporated it in the special rule, and judging by the number that signed the petition for the rule and who voted for it when the rule was adopted by the House, it is going to be incorporated in the pending bill by an overwhelming majority, and it ought to be.

The subject of good roads has been agitated and discussed throughout all parts of our country for a number of years, and there have been conventions and meetings everywhere on the subject, and in many localities large sums have been expended in building and improving the highways by States, counties, and townships. Only to-day I read in a newspaper that in Bayfield County, Wis., the county board voted to bond the county for $50,000 of 4 per cent 10-year bonds for the purpose of building roads during the coming season.

It is a subject of much interest in my State, and I am sure my constituents will approve my action in voting for it. Better roads means much to the farmers; it adds value to the farms, and means a great saving in what the farmer has to haul. In a recent issue of the Saturday Evening Post there was an article by the secretary of the Farmers' Good Roads League of Illinois, and I want to quote an extract therefrom that seems to be extremely appropriate; in fact, it tells much in a few words:

The need of the hour is the road builder, and in no part of the continent is the need greater than in the Mississippi Valley, the granary of the world. In all that vast expanse from Pittsburgh to Denver and from the Lakes to the Gulf is a land of surpassing fertility and almost boundless possibilities, peopled with men and women of marvelous energy, helpful, self-reliant, and prosperous beyond compare. Within two generations they have conquered the wilderness, swept the wigwam from the prairie, and placed in its stead the comfortable, modern farm home. They have crossed and recrossed this great area with railroads over which the traffic of an empire is carried. Is it not strange that a people who have given such splendid proof of their capacity to do great things should fail so signally in dealing with the public roads? The greatest difficulty in building good roads is not the actual construction or even the paying for them, but convincing the people locally that it can be done without burdensome or ruinous taxation. No community ever began the building of stone or gravel roads, usually called hard roads, without the most bitter opposition from farmers who would most largely benefit by the improvement. It is encouraging to know that no community ever began the building of hard roads that did not keep on doing so. When the taxpayers had had the experience of using the roads and paying for them, more roads were demanded, and soon those most violently opposed were found on the firing line fighting for more appropriations for road improvement.

There certainly can be no question about the constitutionality of this proposition, it being a matter proposing to provide money to be expended for the rental of roads used by the Government for carrying the mail, and under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution we certainly have the power to establish post roads, and if we have the power to establish them we have the power to maintain and improve same or to pay for their use. I think the debate has removed any doubt that may have existed in the mind of anyone on the constitutional question. It will, of course, cost the Government something, but not more than we can afford to pay. The farmers of the country are certainly entitled to this much consideration. They have patriotically supported the Government and have not protested against the great sums that have been expended for internal improvements and for the support of the Army and the Navy, and it is only fair that some small part of our revenues be expended for their benefit.

We can curtail our expenses in other directions, and could probably get along if we built fewer battleships, and possibly our Army could be reduced without endangering the safety of the country. In any event, if we can expend $300,000,000 in the construction of the Panama Canal, I am sure we will find some way to get the additional money that will be required if this proposition becomes a law, as I sincerely hope it will. There is nothing in the argument of those who oppose this measure who come from city districts that it is a discrimination in favor of the country and against the city. I know of no money that could be expended that would be of more general good to all of the people in the cities and country as money that might be expended in making better roads, and I am assuming that the money that would be paid under this provision would, in effect, be expended in improving the highways. Everyone knows that good roads leading into a town or city benefits the same, and it is not unusual for enterprising towns to expend money improving the roads leading thereto, as it means the bringing of business and trade that otherwise would go elsewhere. Furthermore, the people in the towns and cities to-day are using the country roads quits as much, if not more, than the farmers, and as you travel along the public highways to-day you meet more automobiles, coming largely from towns and cities, than you will see farmers and others in the country using the public highways.

I might go on discussing this question at greater length, but it is unnecessary. It seems to me as if every phase of it has been fully debated, so that we here thoroughly understand it, and with the debate that will follow under the five-minute rule the matter will be well understood throughout the country, and I will refrain from discussing it further.

Mr. Chairman, since I have been a Member of this House I have been elected at large, and therefore have represented, in part, the whole State of South Dakota. It is a large State, with varied interests, and in the newer portions it has been necessary to secure much legislation for its development. We have had the question of opening up the Indian reservations, legislating for a large Indian population, amending the homestead laws in the interest of inviting immigration and making it easier for the settlers; legislation for reclamation, forest reservations, and many other matters that required attention, which have made our duties harder than that of the average Member of this House who represents a compact, old-settled district. Under the new apportionment we will gain one Member, so that after this Congress we will be represented by three Members of this House.

The State has been divided into three congressional districts, and if it should be my good fortune to again be elected I will in the next Congress represent the second district, being all that part of the State east of the Missouri River and north of a line from the river on the south line of Hughes and the other counties east thereof to the Minnesota line. It will readily be appreciated that as the Representative of this district I will be able to devote my time largely to the interests of the people of that district, and can accomplish more for that part of the State than I have heretofore. This district is strictly an agricultural one, and I may say that there is probably no district in the United States that possesses more uniform and productive land than this. It is settled by an intelligent and progressive people, and I think I am safe in saying that there is probably less illiteracy among the people than in most of the congressional districts of the country. As before stated, the people are engaged very largely in farming. There are no large cities in the district, but there are many prosperous and enterprising small towns and cities. We have rural free delivery very generally throughout the district; also rural telephones, and, in fact, the conveniences that may be found in any of our Eastern States. These people are well informed and they usually know what they want. I may say that they were very much opposed to Canadian reciprocity and are still, and when I opposed that proposition in the last Congress and again opposed it in the special session of this Congress and voted against it I was reflecting the sentiment of the overwhelming majority of the people in the second congressional district in my State.

It has always been my purpose, since being a Member of this House, to try and represent the sentiment of the majority of my constituents upon all public questions, and while I remain a Member I shall continue to serve their interests, always considering their welfare and the welfare and best interests of all the people of our great country; and in reaching this conclusion, with reference to the matters of legislation that are about to be voted upon in the pending bill, I have been actuated only by such motives.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, it is a well-known and most deplorable fact that the poorest paid branch of Government employees to-day is the Railway Mail Service.

It is known that there is no more hazardous employment in this Government, and I believe the House must concede that the compensation is inadequate. In any event, we have in that service probably as intelligent a body of men as are employed anywhere by the Government, men who must have physical courage and who must be physically in good condition, or they could not engage in the employment. Yet we find provided the munificent and generous provision of 15 cents for a dinner or a meal, which the Government is to allow railway mail clerks when they are not able to reach their homes. Fifteen cents may go a long way in the light-lunch business, but men who work as laboriously and faithfully as these men do, who must combine with their work the broadest intelligence and comprehension, ought to receive more consideration at the hands of this great Government, which appropriates $18,000,000 for a single battleship and fabulous sums for every conceivable object, some of which were mentioned this morning. It seems to me that these men engaged in this branch of the Government service, which is so important, bringing the communities into social and business relationship, a service where exactness must be observed, and where, as I say, there is great hazard, deserve better treatment and more conideration. These men do not know what instant their train will be telescoped and themselves mangled or hurled into eternity; and I trust that some attention may be given by this House to a statement which I will submit for publication in the RECORD, showing the contrasting condition between Canada and the United States, showing with what a stinted hand Uncle Sam pays his employees. This comparison is much to the discredit of our own Government. I sincerely trust this great injustice may be corrected at this time in this bill. [Applause.]

The following is the statement to which I refer, showing the conditions with respect to railway mail clerks in the Dominion of Canada:

OTTAWA, February 20, 1912.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of the 14th instant, in which you desire certain information in regard to the Canadian railway mail service, attached herewith you will please find circular, which explains most of the points requested in your letter.

In regard to the third query, there are no grades. Clerks' salaries are increased automatically if they live up to certain standard and pass a satisfactory case examination.

Fourth. Railway mail clerks in Canada are not appointed to any particular route, but appointed to the Dominion service and can be employed on any route, the better clerks being assigned to the principal routes, as the clerks receive more mileage on such routes, although the work is harder. The indifferent clerks are appointed to the smaller routes on which they do not earn as much mileage.

Fifth. In addition to salary and mileage, clerks are paid what is known as detention expenses—that is, when a train is delayed owing to snow blockades or any other cause, which puts them to an expense over and above what they would have on their regular run. The additional expense covers meals, bed, etc.

Sixth. Railway mail clerks appointed previous to 1899 are under what is known as the superannuation act. A deduction is made from his salary and on retiring they receive a percentage of their salary in proportion to the number of years they have been employed.

A clerk who has been 35 years in the service is not called upon to contribute to the fund and is entitled to seven-tenths of his salary. Clerks appointed since 1899 are under what is known as the retirement fund. Five per cent is kept of their salary, which is placed in the fund at 4 per cent interest, compounded half yearly. The amount to their credit in this fund is refunded to them on their retirement from the service or to their heirs should they die while in the service.

Seventh. Sick and accident leave is granted for a reasonable time with pay. The sick leave of absence depends upon the record of the clerk. Leave due to railway accident or to a clerk who has been a long time in the service and who is absent through illness covers full salary for one year.

If there is any further information you desire, I would be pleased to furnish you.

Yours, truly,

CONTROLLER OF RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE OF CANADA.

CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYMENT OF RAILWAY MAIL CLERKS.

1. No person can be appointed a railway mail clerk unless he is under 30 years of age and has passed the civil-service qualifying examination.

2. New appointment must furnish a satisfactory medical certificate in regard to his health, eyesight, and hearing; also a statement as to where he has previously been employed, together with a statement from his former employer giving reasons for leaving his service.

3. Railway mail clerks, on appointment, will receive a salary of $500 per annum, with annual increase of $100 until the salary of $800 per annum is reached, and thereafter an increase of $50 per annum until the maximum of $1,400 per annum is reached.

In addition to the above, railway mail clerks also receive mileage allowance as follows:

One-half cent per mile for every mile traveled in postal car on duty between 8 a. m. and 8 p. m. and 1 cent per mile for every mile traveled in postal car on duty between 8 p. m. and 8 a. m.

4. New appointments must be probationary for a period of one year. At the end of one year, provided his services are satisfactory and he has obtained at least 50 per cent at case examination, he may be confirmed in his appointment and his salary increased to $600 per annum.

5. Annual increases thereafter are made as the result of a clerk's case examination (at which he must obtain at least 90 per cent), general efficiency, and interest in the service.

6. If an acting railway mail clerk is appointed a probationary railway mail clerk, the period of his temporary service can not be counted as part of the probationary period such clerk has to serve.

7. No person will be placed on duty as a railway mail clerk unless the superintendent of the district to which he is assigned is satisfied as to his character, health, and fitness for the service.

NOTE.—On No. 3, on small lines, where clerks in United States make 100 miles per day, $1,100 is the highest salary—$300 difference or more in Canada, plus mileage allowance, amount, on a run like my own, to more than $500 more per year.

To show how much more competent we must be than clerks in Canadian service (Nos. 4 and 5 above) we must make 95 per cent on first examination and 98 per cent in review.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced a bill (H. R. 23763) for the establishment of a mutual bonding fund under the supervision of the Government. In the preparation and introduction of this bill I follow the recommendation of the joint commission created by an act of Congress under date of August 5, 1907. This commission consisted of Hon. James A. Tawney, Hon. Walter Smith, and Hon. Eaton J. Bowers, Members of the House, and Hon. J. H. GALLINGER, Hon. CHARLES CURTIS, and Hon. MURPHY J. FOSTER, Members of the Senate. Their recommendation is found in report No. 2267, which was submitted to the House on February 27, 1911. I have introduced this bill because of the following facts: First, the premium rates charged Government employees by surety companies are very many times more than they ought to be, and, second, the Government is not adequately protected.

In the first place, the companies insist that the standard of reasonable rates is a premium income equal to three times the losses paid. It does not seem to me that such a standard can be defended for one moment, and, if it could be defended, the statistics compiled by the experts appointed by this commission show that the rates are far in excess even of this amount. Let us take the Post Office Department for an illustration. During the last five years the premium receipts from employees were $417,919.85, and that the total losses paid were $100,014.01.

In all the other departments the premium income was nearly six times the amount of losses that have been paid; $1,214,388.88 have been collected during the past 15 years, out of which net losses amounting to $206,972.76 were paid.

But that is not the whole story or the most discouraging part of it. The Government is not protected under the present system of bonding. The standard of adequate protection is, of course, full and prompt payments of all losses without recourse to litigation. But the investigation made by this commission shows that the surety companies have not paid losses in full, have not paid them promptly, and have not paid them, generally, without litigation. Of claims aggregating $616,942.42 which have accrued under bonds outside of the Post Office Department having corporate sureties, the companies have paid claims amounting to only $226,325.88. They have paid only 36.69 per cent of the amount due the Government under their legitimate losses, and much of that has been paid only after long and vexatious litigation.

Several remedies have been suggested. First, that we return to personal surety exclusively. This might be some improvement over corporate sureties. This investigation shows that while the Government has been able to collect only 36.69 per cent of its losses from surety companies it has been able to collect 43.84 per cent of its losses where the bonds were signed by persons. This method of bonding, however, forces Government employees into embarrassing positions and frequently puts them under obligations to people to whom they ought not be obligated. If the officers of a bank sign the postmaster's bonds, they expect the postmaster to deposit Government funds in their bank.

Other remedies have been suggested, such as the deposit by employees of cash or securities as a guaranty of fidelity. The size of the bonds required by the Government makes this impracticable.

It is also suggested that we continue the present system and provide for more strict supervision of the companies, and pass a law giving the Government the power to fix rates charged. This might work out satisfactorily to the Government if it were not for the fact that these companies always vigorously resist, by every legal subterfuge at their command, all efforts made by the Government to protect itself and its employees. The whole history of the dealings by the Government with these companies is a history of litigation, compromise, and failure.

It is also suggested that all bonds be abolished and that defaulters be prosecuted more stringently. This is the practice generally followed in Great Britain, Germany, and Austria. They go on the theory that—

> The fear of hell is the hangman's rope
> That hauls the guilty wretch to heaven.

This method, however, results in a great deal of loss to the Government.

The remedy suggested in the bill which I have introduced would result in complete protection to the Government. It would cost the employee less than half the amount he is paying to-day. It would do away with fruitless and annoying litigation and with all of the cumbersome details in the matter of administration.

The system is not new or untried. It was established in the Philippine Islands in 1907, and has worked out most satisfactorily, both to the Government and to the employees. It is working satisfactorily in the Netherlands, Switzerland, and in Canada.

But surety companies are doing nothing for the Government and its employees that could not be done much more satisfactorily and economically in another way. The companies simply collect the premiums from the employees to create a fund out of which the Government may be reimbursed in case of loss. For this service they charge from 70 per cent to 90 per cent of the premiums collected.

The result of the investigation made by this most able commission shows that it is possible to get better security and to get it for much less money than the present system now costs. I sincerely hope that this bill may become a law at this session of Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, there is no other arm of the postal service which shows so plainly the peculiarly social benefactions of the entire postal system as does the rural mail delivery. The Member of Congress who was active here 15 years ago and who knew intimately at the time the sentiment of Congress in regard to rural delivery of mail, had he slept a Rip Van Winkle sleep and had come back to-day would not believe his eyes.

For in the beginning of this service there was a large and clamorous faction which affected to believe, perhaps in part did believe, that the innovation of carrying the mail daily out to the farms would bring the whole postal structure crashing down into magnificent ruin. I remember reading about 14 years ago a Postmaster General's report, in which that official declared in alarm that this system, if extended, might eventually entail an expenditure of $30,000,000. To-day the expenditure goes to $43,375,000, and instead of the disaster which many men prophesied, every increase in expenditure and extension of rural mail delivery has added to the perfection of the whole mail establishment, and I think, without exception, every American to-day rejoices that the system is as extensive as it is, and is proud of our achievement. As late as five years ago there were men in public life who still believed that in some way rural mail delivery could be changed in form or so curtailed that its growth would cease. If any of this school exist to-day they are few in number and voiceless. And rural mail delivery becomes as permanent, as stable, and as vitally and intimately a force in the daily life of America and in our national development as suffrage itself.

I am glad to say that this bill carries an increase in the compensation to the carriers, and in this connection let me say there has been a change in attitude toward the rural mail carrier quite as marked as the change of mind on the system itself. While it seems unbelievable to-day, there were men 15 years ago who expected the rural carrier to do the work virtually for nothing. There was an odd disposition among certain congressional economists to believe that in the country a horse and wagon did not cost anything, that a horse and wagon were simply a gratuity of full-handed nature, as wild strawberries are. It took years and years of effort by the carriers and their friends to establish the elemental fact that the upkeep of their outfit involved expenditure.

Another curious delusion of the old days was that the rural carrier in delivering the mail was after all doing only a chance chore, that he could throw the job in on the day's work without effort. The men who had this view came slowly to the knowledge that the Rural Mail Delivery Service was a regular force performing a duty with regularity, with dispatch, and with security, subject to rule, answerable to authority, and enjoined with responsibility. But these men, while they came slowly to the knowledge, came at last.

With the development of the Rural Mail Service, with its great popularity and with its remarkably rapid growth, the rural mail carrier himself, by his conduct, has had a world to do. The service itself, belief in it, pride in it, hope of its growth, has asked of the carrier, and has received universally, loyalty. Whatever the weather, whatever the barrier, with the carrier the service is first. The top line in his rules of duty is to deliver the mail on time, and as these men march forth every morning, winding out through highway and country lane, they move like clockwork and have become, with the development of the system, one of the most highly perfected and efficient services of the modern world.

What few opponents of rural mail delivery are left are negligible. To all others rural delivery of the mail has become a national ornament. The very magnitude of our country, territorially, made the attempt an extraordinarily ambitious one, but its accomplishment, in spite of its difficulty, is the greater on that account. The marvel of this day of mutuality in the world is the magic, the miracle, of intercommunication. With every development of wireless telegraphy, of telephony, of acceleration in the mail, our wonder grows apace. And in the midst of the agencies for development which are working upward to a realization of the ideals of the democracy through the social forces of humanity none has higher place than rural mail delivery.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. FINLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Platt, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6472. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell certain land to the First Baptist Church of Plymouth, Mass; and

S. 5461. An act to regulate the traffic in intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 6472. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell certain land to the First Baptist Church of Plymouth, Mass.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 5461. An act to regulate the traffic in intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, section 8 of the Post Office appropriation bill now under consideration reads as follows:

SEC. 8. That hereafter postage shall be paid on matter of the fourth class at the rate of 12 cents per pound, except as herein provided.

That no article, package, or parcel shall be mailable as matter of the fourth class which exceeds 11 pounds in weight, except as herein provided.

That on each and all rural-mail delivery routes of the United States the postmaster at the starting point of such route shall, until June 30, 1914, receive and deliver to the carrier or carriers of said routes all articles, parcels, or packages not prohibited to the mails by law and falling under the definition of fourth-class matter and not weighing in excess of 11 pounds for transportation and delivery on said routes only; and the carriers shall receive at intermediate points on all rural routes such mail matter of the fourth class for delivery on their respective routes only.

That postage shall be paid on all articles, parcels, or packages entitled to transportation under the provisions of this act as matter of the fourth class on rural-mail delivery routes only at the following rates: One cent for each 2 ounces or less, 2 cents for more than 2 ounces but not more than 4 ounces, 3 cents for more than 4 ounces but not more than 8 ounces, 4 cents for more than 8 ounces but not more than 12 ounces, 5 cents for more than 12 ounces but not more than a pound, and 2 cents per pound for each additional pound or fraction thereof up to and including a total of 11 pounds. That the Postmaster General shall make all rules and regulations necessary and not inconsistent with law to the proper execution of this act.

That for the purpose of a full and complete inquiry and investigation into the feasibility and propriety of the establishment of a general parcel-post commission of six persons, three of whom shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and three by the President of the Senate, is constituted, with full power to appoint clerks, stenographers, and experts to assist them in this work. They shall review the testimony already taken on the subject of parcel post by Senate and House committees and take such other testimony as they deem desirable. For the purpose of defraying the expenses of this commission the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated out of the moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Usually the rate of postage charged on first-class mail matter is 2 cents an ounce or fraction thereof. Of course, this does not apply to post or postal cards.

Second-class mail matter, such as newspapers and periodical publications, pays postage at the rate of 1 cent for each 4 ounces or fractional part thereof. In other words, at the rate of 4 cents a pound, except when mailed by news agents or the publishers themselves, and then it goes through the mails at the rate of 1 cent a pound.

The rate of postage on mail matter of the third class is 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof on each individually addressed piece or parcel, or at the rate of 8 cents a pound, while the rate of postage on fourth-class mail matter is 1 cent an ounce or fraction thereof on each individually addressed piece or parcel, or at the rate of 16 cents a pound.

This is an ounce and not a pound rate.

LIMIT OF WEIGHT IN MAILS.

Section 3879 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides, with a few exceptions, that no single package shall be sent through the United States mails which weighs more than 4 pounds. This provision of the law applies to both the third and fourth class mail matter, but does not apply to either the first or second class mail matter. Section 488 of the Postal Laws and Regulations provides:

Mail matter of the first class fully prepaid and matter of the second class prepaid at either the regular or transient rate will be accepted for mailing at any post office regardless of the weight thereof.

With these observations as to what the present law is, let us see what changes in same are made by the provisions of the bill we have under consideration.

This section 8 of the bill under discussion—the parcel-post section—contemplates four changes in the law as it now exists. It contemplates, first, a reduction of rate on all fourth-class mail matter all over the entire country from 16 cents a pound to 12 cents a pound. It contemplates, second, a further reduction on fourth-class mail matter on all the rural routes of the country from 16 cents a pound to practically 2 cents a pound. It contemplates, further, an increase in weight of the fourth-class mail matter from 4 pounds to 11 pounds, and, fourth, the establishment of a commission to investigate the advisability of putting into operation the general parcel-post system all over the country.

It will be observed that the special postage rates provided for in this bill—the rates of 1 cent for each 2 ounces, or 2 cents for each 4 ounces, or 2 cents a pound for each additional pound above 1 pound—shall be only applicable to fourth-class mail when deposited with the postmaster at the starting point, or at some intermediate point of a rural mail delivery route for transportation and delivery on that route only. In other words, if John Jones, living on some rural mail delivery route wanted to order a package of 11 pounds from Sears, Roebuck & Co., of Chicago, he would have to pay $1.32 postage on said package; but if he should order the same package from Tom Jones, who ran a country store on the rural mail delivery route on which Tom Jones lived, he would have to pay only 25 cents postage for the transmission and delivery of the same package. The argument has been made that the parcel post would drive out of business and ruin the country merchant; that the country people and those living in towns and villages would order their goods, wares, and merchandise from the large mail-order houses; that the money heretofore spent with the country merchant and some of which remained in the community would, under the parcel post, all be taken out of the community; that in times of sickness, stress, local taxation, and improvement, the country merchant being a part of the community always contributes his part and does his full share toward the bettering of conditions and the making of good citizenship; that the mail-order houses and foreign merchants do none of these things; and that the inauguration of the parcel post is not fair to the country merchant and will in the end work harm to the entire country. The present bill can not possibly have that effect. It discriminates for and not against the country merchant.

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, having in charge this bill, in their report to the House has this to say:

One of the most difficult questions connected with proposed postal progress arises with the suggestion to create a general unlimited parcel post for the transportation of merchandise at a flat rate of 8 cents a pound or less, with a limit of 11 pounds or a greater number of pounds.

The advocates of this proposition insist that the rate on fourth-class matter (merchandise) was at one time 8 cents a pound with no loss of revenue, but an increase of revenue; that the zone system of transportation charges used by the express companies is unnecessary and cumbersome; that express companies pay wheelage to railroad companies and divide profits and still make annually colossal profits at the expense of the people; that it is the right of the people to use the mails for their own benefit and the right of the consumer to buy wherever he can secure the best bargain, whether it be at home or in another State or city, and that the complaint of this view is from selfish sources; that a largely increased revenue will come to the Government from the system and advantages and blessings to the whole people in its operation.

The opponents of a general unlimited parcel post insist that it will tend to concentrate business in the large cities and be injurious to rural communities and small towns and cities; that it is a step in the wrong direction—paternalistic and dangerous in its tendencies; that it would create an enormous deficit in the Post Office Department; that it would revolutionize the commercial system in the United States; that it would seriously delay the delivery of legitimate mail; that it would deplete or destroy the prosperity of innumerable country towns and villages, and therefore must be regarded as a menace to the welfare of all the people; that it is class legislation in that it discriminates against the country merchant and favors the great retail mail-order houses; that it is in effect a subsidy to the retail mail-order houses—wrong in principle and unfair in practice; and they further insist that a rural parcel post would be an entering wedge for a general parcel post.

The most of people living in the country and engaged in agriculture and other pursuits, so far as we can secure information, and the larger mercantile establishments in the great cities favor an unlimited parcel-post law. The country merchant and nearly all merchants of the smaller cities and towns oppose the law. This seems to be the alignment. Self-interest, the mainspring of most of our actions, seems to be commanding in both factions. We do not think that the advantages claimed for the establishment of this post will be so great as its ultra-friends claim, nor that the disadvantages would be nearly so great as its enemies fear.

The necessity for conservative legislation in view of such a contention and division among the people is apparent. We should seek to secure all the advantages possible and avoid all the disadvantages that may arise from any proposed legislation in the interests of the masses of the whole people. Laws should bear as nearly as possible equally and justly on all classes under all conditions. We have heard much testimony, very interesting in its details, but for the most part from those who express an opinion from a general view of general conditions. We need specific facts and not merely opinions on which to pass intelligent and satisfactory legislation. It would seem essential that we know how this innovation in our postal system will affect our revenue; what additional burdens we must assume in increased numbers of employees, and the increased railway and carriage pay; whether a flat rate can be established for the whole of the United States or not, and at what figure; whether it would be wise to adopt the zone system of transportation and pay for carriage or not; how far this extra service would interfere with the handling of first, second, and third class mail matter; the probable losses and profits under different rates; the effect on the centralization of trade; whether the express companies could under one system or another secure the short hauls and leave the long and expensive hauls to the Government; whether it would first be best to condemn the express companies' contracts with the railroads or not, and use them, or to force the railroad companies to equal rates for the Post Office Department that is granted the express companies, or to pursue either of these courses; to know the tendency of the system to create and sustain monopolies, and its effect on the commercial and farming interests of the country. On these matters there should be some definite information (in the interest of the general public) for use in the enactment of a wise law on the subject, before any law general and unlimited in its character at a low rate of postage and increased number in pounds should be established. This information can best be obtained and applied for good results only after a full consideration by a commission of persons especially equipped and experienced in such investigations and clothed with full power to ascertain the facts. Therefore the embodiment in this bill of a section creating a commission and directing the examination and report, that the true facts and conditions may be known in advance of legislation.

The same conditions do not exist, and therefore the same reasoning does not apply to the strictly rural parcel post confined to matter of the fourth class arising and for delivery on each specific rural free delivery route. These routes are already established. All of their machinery is in full operation. The additional burdens on the carrier are slight, and a slight additional compensation is provided for in this bill. The estimate of the department is that a change in equipment will be necessary as to only about 15 per cent of the routes. We have therefore provided for a limited rural route parcel post with postage rates at 5 cents per pound for the first pound and 2 cents per pound over 1 pound and for fractions of pounds, to 11 pounds limit as an experimental proposition. This experiment will last for two years on all of the routes in the United States. If it shall prove to be unwise, it can be repealed or expire by limitation. We think that it will be a combined advantage to the farmer and to the country merchant and of no possible injury to anyone. The estimated increase in revenue from this source is from seven to ten millions of dollars in its limited character. We feel that it is the duty of Congress, in response to the almost universal demand from the people residing in the rural and agricultural districts of the United States, to inaugurate this system of limited rural parcel post, experimentally at least. We do not believe that it would be wise to establish a general or unlimited parcel post on the lines suggested until there has been information of such definite and certain character as to justify us in taking a position so important and necessarily affecting the revenues to the extent that it will.

This report sets out pretty clearly the contention both of the friends and the enemies of the parcel post, and shows pretty conclusively that there is room for argument on both sides of the general parcel-post question. The framers of the bill under discussion are in such doubt as to the effect upon the welfare of the country of a flat rate general parcel-post system that they have in section 8 of the bill provided for the creation of a parcel-post commission of 6 persons, 3 to be appointed by the President of the Senate and 3 by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and whose duty it shall be to—review the testimony already taken on the subject of parcel post by the Senate and House committee and take such other testimony as they deem advisable—in order that legislation affecting the convenience and welfare of so many of our people shall be based upon facts and not upon guesswork.

One thing, however, is sure, and that is that the country merchant need not be alarmed about the effect on his business if the present bill should become a law. In the case I cited awhile ago, the country farmer, mechanic, miner, or laboring man, living on the same rural route as the country merchant, would have to pay $1.32 postage on an 11-pound package ordered from Sears, Roebuck & Co., while if ordered from the country merchant it would cost them only 25 cents postage. Evidently the country merchant has no just complaint under this arrangement. If anybody has a right to complain it is the farmer, the laborer, and other consumers, who insist, with much show of reason, that they have a right, and that it is their duty, to buy wherever they can secure the best bargain, whether it be at home or abroad, whether with the country merchant or the mail-order houses in the great cities.

While I am not satisfied with the provisions of the present bill, I shall vote for it because it will help a good many people and harm nobody and give us a chance to try out the scheme.

It is the beginning of the solution of the problem of cheaper transportation and the enlargement of transportation facilities. The framers of this bill frankly admit that it is, at best, but an experiment; that they are not in possession of sufficient facts and data upon which to base any general legislation upon this subject at this time. This bill provides for only a limited rural route parcel post until June 30, 1914. If this legislation should prove to be unwise, it can be repealed or expire by limitation. If it should prove to be salutary and beneficial, it can be kept upon the statute books of this country. In the meantime the commission created by this bill—a commission in all probability to be composed of three Democrats and three Republicans, specially adapted and fitted for this work—will be engaged in such a study and investigation of this question and in the obtaining of such facts and information thereon as will enable Congress to pass such laws upon the subject as will prove to be a benefit and a blessing to the great body of our citizenship.

THE UNITED STATES FURNISHES FOREIGN COUNTRIES BETTER MAIL FACILITIES THAN IT FURNISHES ITS OWN PEOPLE.

As I understand it, there are now 23 foreign countries that have the right to transmit through the mails of the United States fourth-class mail matter in packages up to the weight of 11 pounds, for which they are charged only 12 cents a pound. Therefore, by incorporating and making that a part of the laws of this country, we put our own people upon the same footing and our own facilities for use by our own people on the same terms that we now extend to 23 foreign countries. I am firmly of the opinion that the mails of our own country should be put to the use of our own people on terms as fair and reasonable as those which we extend to the people of other countries.

FAVORS REDUCED RATES ON RURAL ROUTES.

A very distinguished Member of this House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], the other day raised the objection that the Members of this House ought not to support that feature of the bill which provided for reduced rates on fourth-class mail matter on rural routes, because it was, he said, a discrimination in favor of the people who live on the rural routes of the country and against the people who live in the large cities of the land. Looking at it from one viewpoint it might be regarded as a discrimination, but from another viewpoint it is not a discrimination. In the first place the standard rural routes of this country are only about 24 miles in length.

In sending the mail a short distance of 24 miles the Government does not have to carry it to the great length that is ordinarily true of other mail sent throughout the country. The gentleman forgets, too, that in the great cities of the country there have been built at the expense of the Government custom-houses and public buildings for the convenience of the people who live in the cities, and he forgets further that in the great cities of this country and in many smaller ones the mails of the United States are laid down at the very door of the inhabitants of those cities, even on their desks in their offices, enormous quantities of it, some five or six times a day, while the people who live in rural districts are not blessed and provided for by the Government in any such fashion. Yet they are citizens and taxpayers of this great country. They are all citizens of the United States, and are as much entitled to its protection and service as the people who live in the larger cities. For these and other reasons I am heartily in favor of the reduction in rate on the rural routes as provided for in this bill. And besides, when so reduced, the rates are not near as low as the rates now existing on second and third class mail matter.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWERS. With pleasure.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand it is provided in this bill that in this special rural route parcel-post proposition the business must begin and terminate on the same route. Is that the gentleman's understanding?

Mr. POWERS. That is true.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the gentleman see any objection to an amendment whereby, say, if I lived on route A, starting out of a given city, and the gentleman lived on route B, both being farmers, I could send a package into the central starting point of both routes addressed to the gentleman and have it delivered to him? Does the gentleman see any objection to an amendment of that effect, so as to extend it to all the rural routes on the same starting point?

Mr. POWERS. I do not see any objection to that proposition or amendment, and, on the contrary, I shall give it my hearty support if the gentleman decides to offer such an amendment, because it is a meritorious amendment and ought to be made a part of the law. There is no reason why these fourth-class packages should not be sent at reduced postage on all connecting rural routes. This would benefit both the country merchants and the farmers as well as all who live in those communities or sections of country, and would not hurt anybody. I hope to see the gentleman's suggested amendment made a part of this bill and enacted into law.

Mr. WILLIS. It has been stated by different gentlemen in this debate that under the rules of the department and the present state of the law that even if this provision to which you have referred be adopted enlarging the weight limit from 4 to 11 pounds it will not be possible for the farmer to send through the mail any of the products that he raises. Does the gentleman know whether that is the fact? It has been stated here a number of times, and I am interested to have the gentleman's opinion about it.

Mr. POWERS. I want to state to the gentleman from Ohio that under the provisions of this bill the farmer will not have the right to send his products through the mails either at the limit of 4 pounds or 11 pounds or any other weight. None of the things which the farmer produces and has to sell are now included in fourth-class mail matter. As I have already pointed out, second-class mail matter—newspapers and periodicals—can be sent through the mails by editors and news agents in unlimited weight at the rate of 1 cent a pound. Manufacturers of merchandise and those who sell and handle it have the right under our laws as they now exist to send 4-pound packages of such merchandise through the mails of the United States at the rate of 16 cents a pound. The farmers of our country are not so privileged or so blessed as to their products. I would like to see at least the nonperishable products of the farm included in fourth-class mail matter on the rural routes of the country, if no further, and their advisability as fourth-class mail matter and experimental extension tried out under the provisions of this bill.

And I want to say further to the gentleman from Ohio that the commission which under the provision of this bill has been constituted for the purpose of working out this system ought to figure out some scheme whereby the man who lives on the farm and produces butter and eggs and potatoes and that character of stuff should have the right to send direct that stuff to the consumer instead of sending it to the commission houses and wholesale merchants, and let it go through a dozen hands before it finally reaches the table of the consumer. I want to say further that it is my information that in the year 1909 the farmers of this country produced more than $9,000,000,000 worth of products. Assuming that they used one-third of that, it would make them sell the remainder for $6,000,000,000. It is worth that much to the farmer, but when it finally reaches the table of the consumer it costs the consumer some $13,000,000,000. In other words, the price of the farmer's product was more than doubled from the time it left his hands until it finally got to the mouths of the consumers. I shall not support the proposition to take over the express companies at this time, as provided for in the Goeke bill.

My information is not sufficiently accurate and not sufficiently comprehensive to enable me to know whether or not that is or is not for the best, but I am firmly of the opinion that this bill now under consideration ought to be so amended that this investigation committee shall have the same power to investigate the proposition of the postal express and railway express that it has the proposition of a general parcel post. That is the way I feel on that question. The present bill reads:

That for the purpose of a full and complete inquiry and investigation into the feasibility and propriety of the establishment of a general parcel post, a commission of six persons, three of whom shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and three by the President of the Senate, is constituted.

And so forth.

I think after the words "general parcel post" should be added the words "postal express and railway express, or both," so as to give this commission the power and authority to investigate the subject of the postal express and railway express as well as the general parcel post. Many very able gentlemen contend that the solution of our problem lies, not in the general parcel post but in the postal express or railway express.

They contend that no general parcel-post system will ever be able to solve the great problem before the country of getting the vital necessaries of life direct from the producer to the consumer at something akin to the price at which they are produced. As I said before, none of the provisions of the bill under discussion attempt to solve the problem. They provide only for the carrying of fourth-class mail matter at a lower rate than heretofore, but if you will examine the list of articles which are included in fourth-class matter you will find that none of the things which the farmer produces are included in fourth-class mail matter.

The thing the country needs is such a system, if it can be worked out, as will not only provide for the carrying of fourth-class mail matter, as now constituted, much in excess of 11-pound parcels and packages, but such a system as will include and provide for the transportation, direct, of the vital necessaries of life from the farmers' bountiful hands to the millions of hungry mouths in the cities and towns scattered throughout the length and breadth of our land; and that, too, in such a way as will not do violence to our country merchants or any other class of our citizenship.

That is the vital question. It is a sad commentary upon the statesmanship of our country that in a land of peace and plenty, where better wages are paid the laborer, the artisan, the skilled mechanic than ever before in the history of the world—better than in all other countries of the world—he still finds himself hard pressed to make both ends meet, hard pressed to properly rear, shelter, feed, and clothe his family. The trouble lies in the high cost of living. One reason for that is either the lack of, or high cost of transportation; and when we think of transportation we naturally think of the railroad companies and the express companies of the country; but the trouble about the railroad companies is that they do a wholesale and not a retail business.

The railway minimum unit of shipment is 100 pounds, and its minimum charge is 25 cents. The consumer does not need at one time 100 pounds of butter or a dozen crates of eggs. The railroads contend that they can not profitably carry packages weighing less than 100 pounds for the reason that every shipment carried by them, whether large or small, whether the distance is long or short, amount to some 20 acts of attention in number; that this takes time and labor and costs money.

The acts of attention by the railroad, through its employees, are:

(1) Unloads articles from consignor's vehicle.
(2) Loads article in car.
(3) Ascertains rate to be paid.
(4) Makes out bill of lading.
(5) Makes out waybill and sends copy to auditor and the train conductor.
(6) Receiving agent, destination, receipts to conductor;
(7) Sends notice to consignee;
(8) Unloads package from car;
(9) Takes receipt of consignee;
(10) Loads it on consignee's wagon.
(11) Agent gets money for shipment;
(12) Copies bill of lading into record of freight forwarded;
(13) Copies bill of lading into record of freight received;
(14) Sends statement of freight sent to auditor;
(15) Sends statement of freight received to auditor.
(16) Auditor checks bill of lading against records of sending agent;
(17) Checks bill of lading against record of receiving agent;
(18) Advises treasurer of money due by each agent;
(19) Makes statistical report from bill of lading;
(20) Calculates, per bill of lading, amount payable the different railways.

While if the same shipment were sent by the postal system a postage stamp would do the work for it—no bookkeeping, no accounting, and but little handling. The same thing is true in a large measure of the express companies as with the railroad companies; and, besides, the express companies have no way of transporting anything much except by means of the railroads. The contracts between the express companies and the railroad companies, on an average, provide that the railroad companies get 47½ per cent of the final rate fixed by the express companies. In other words, the express companies pay the railroad companies for transporting the packages practically one-half of the express charges they receive. The person who sends the express package foots the entire bill. In the end he pays the railroad companies their excessive charges and the express companies their excessive rates.

In the year 1909 the average charge of carrying a ton of freight in this country was $1.90, while the average charge of carrying a ton of express was $31.20. In other words, the express charge in this country is about sixteen times the freight; while in France, Germany, and other countries of the world the express charge is only about five times the freight charge, i. e., the average ton of freight is about 85 cents, and the average ton of express about $4.25. If this proves anything, it proves that our express charges are about two or three times as high as they ought to be. But will the general flat-rate parcel post at either 8 or 12 cents a pound give us relief from this condition? A good many people are advocating a general parcel post with a flat rate at 12 cents a pound. Others fix it at 8 cents a pound.

One hundred and ninety-six miles is the average length of journey of express packages in this country, and presumably about the average journey which postal shipment would make. For the purpose of comparing the prevailing express charges with the charges which would be paid both under the 8-cent-a-pound and 12-cent-a-pound parcel-post arrangement for the average carrying distance of 196 miles, I submit the following table:

Table comparing parcel-post rates with express-company rates.

Rate.	Parcel post.		Express-company rate.
	12 cents per pound.	8 cents per pound.
1 pound	$0.12	$0.08	[1] $0.10
2 pounds	.24	.16	.16
3 pounds	.36	.24	.24
4 pounds	.48	.32	.32
5 pounds	.60	.40	.40
7 pounds	.84	.56	.45
Total	7.92	5.28	3.97

[1] If prepaid, the express companies now carry books at a rate of 8 cents a pound, and merchandise, or fourth-class mail matter, at 16 cents a pound.

This shows that both the 8 and 12 cent parcel-post rates are higher than the present express rates. In other words, the express companies now charge an average of $31.20 the ton of packages.

The 8-cent parcel-post rate would amount to $160 a ton and the 12-cent rate to $240 a ton. And since the express rates are twice as high as they should be, what shall we say of these rates?

In view of these conditions many advocate the taking over of the express companies by the Government at a fair value and reducing the rates to about one-half for all express shippers and extending the service through rural delivery to the farmer and the country store. They argue that by that method the town delivery system of the express companies can be coupled up with the rural delivery system of the Post Office Department and both with the railways, the result being that there can be a cheap and direct shipment from producer to consumer, and in such quantities as the consumer needs, with benefits and blessings to all and harm and injury to none.

Others are equally sincere in their contention that the buying up of the express companies is not the way to get relief. They contend that the Government would be buying up so much "old junk"; that the Government would have to take over some 50,000 employees of the express companies in order to run the business; that, as a matter of fact, we do not need the express companies; that railroad transportation at reasonable rates and not express-company interference is what we need.

In view of the transcendent importance of the subject to the people of this country and the contrariety of opinion on the same, I indorse the experimental rural parcel-post delivery as contemplated by the bill we have under discussion, as well as the creation of a commission not only to investigate the general parcel post, but the postal express and railway express as well; and all to the end that wise legislation on this subject may soon be enacted that will harm no class of our citizenship, but prove to be a benefit and a blessing to them all.

GOOD ROADS.

The provision of the bill under discussion relative to good roads is as follows:

That for the purposes of this act certain highways of the several States and the civil subdivisions thereof are classified as follows:

Class A shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide, composed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam, graded, crowned, compacted, and maintained in such manner that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface, and all other roads having a road track not less than 9 feet wide of a construction equally smooth, firm, durable, and expensive, and continuously kept in proper repair. Class B shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide, composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface. Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times. That whenever the United States shall use any highway of any State or civil subdivision thereof which falls within classes A, B, or C for the purpose of transporting rural mail, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile for highways of class A, $20 per annum per mile for highways of class B, and $15 per annum per mile for highways of class C. The United States shall not pay any compensation or toll for such use of such highways other than that provided for in this section, and shall pay no compensation whatever for the use of any highway not falling within classes A, B, or C. That any question arising as to the proper classification of any road used for transporting rural mail shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. That the compensation herein provided for shall be paid at the end of each fiscal year by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Postmaster General to the officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act.

This is a compromise measure. I introduced at this session of Congress a bill on the subject of good roads; so did about 25 other Representatives. It was agreed by most of those introducing bills that the bill I have just quoted would stand the best chance of any of those introduced of becoming a law at this session; so we all signed a written request to the Rules Committee asking that this piece of legislation be taken up and considered by the House at this time, and as a result of our joint effort the question of Federal aid to the use, maintenance, and improvement of good roads is finally before this House for consideration. I congratulate this House and I congratulate the country. There is no question before the American people to-day that affects so vitally so many homes and so many firesides.

There is no other question for solution before the American public to-day in which the constituents I have the honor to represent are so intensely interested and so vitally concerned. For 100 years or more our development has been hampered and our growth retarded because of the lack of transportation facilities. We hail with delight the day, even the prospect, of the Federal Government becoming interested to the point of assistance in the betterment of our road conditions.

BILL DOES NOT GO FAR ENOUGH.

It is true that this bill does not go far enough. It ought to include a class of roads that do not come up to class C. But it is a step in the right direction, and I shall give it my hearty support.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. What is that?

Mr. POWERS. A step in the direction——

Mr. KOPP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWERS. In one moment, when I have answered the question of the gentleman from New York. A step in the direction of furnishing all over this great country highways of such a character that will afford an opportunity for the people who live in the rural districts to have communication with the outside world and an opportunity to get their stuff to market.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Has the gentleman figured out how much that may cost?

Mr. POWERS. I have not. It is estimated, however, I understand, that the cost the first year will be about $16,000,000.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Does not the gentleman believe that it will cost at least $25,000,000,000 to build good roads over the country?

Mr. POWERS. Let it cost whatever it may cost; the States and municipalities and not the Federal Government will have to foot the bill. All that the bill under consideration requires is that the Federal Government shall pay toll or rental for its use of the roads. It is not required to build or construct them.

The fact is that the United States does not own a foot of national roads. Not one.

The further fact is that there is now over 2,000,000 miles of public highways in the United States built by the various States and their various subdivisions. The National Government does not own a foot of them, but uses thousands upon thousands of miles of them.

During this last year there was expended, not by the National Government, but by the States and municipalities, $150,000,000 on the public highways of this country.

The argument has been made here that it is a wrong principle for the Federal Government to undertake to aid in the construction of good roads.

Mr. KOPP. Will the gentleman yield right in that same line? Does the gentleman understand that this proposed amendment requires the local community, whatever it may be, to apply the aid received from the Federal Government for the improvement of the highways?

Mr. POWERS. I do not have any such an understanding.

Mr. KOPP. That it does not?

Mr. POWERS. That it does not.

Mr. KOPP. Then, if it may be expended for any use that these local communities may see fit, what justification is there for saying that this is for the improvement of the highways?

Mr. POWERS. I am very glad to answer the gentleman's question. From my viewpoint it does not matter where or how the local municipality expends this money. Before the local community can get any money from the Federal Governmenty they have got to have roads up to class A, class B, and class C standards. Whether they get their roads in such condition by local taxation, whether they do it by digging the roads themselves, or in some other way, the fact remains that they have got to have the roads in such a state of perfection before any money is paid by the Federal Government on those roads, and the roads must be continuously kept in such state of perfection by the local authorities.

Mr. KOPP. Now, the gentleman is referring to roads that are to be constructed in the future. What about this subsidy where they pay for roads already constructed? Will we not be simply making a donation to the local community rather than a donation to the improvement of highways?

Mr. POWERS. There is no subsidy to it. If the roads are already constructed by the local authorities and come up to class A, class B, or Class C standard, and if the Government of the United States uses those roads for the purpose of transmitting its mail over them, I see no reason why the Government should not begin paying for the privilege of so doing. It has not done so in the past.

Mr. KOPP. Then the gentleman's position is not so much for the improvement of the highways as it is that he believes the Federal Government should pay the local municipality for the use of the highway?

Mr. POWERS. In answer to the gentleman's question I desire to say that I think it not only fair but right and equitable and just that the Federal Government, if it uses the roads constructed by somebody else for the purpose of doing its own business over those roads, should pay for that privilege; and upon that ground and from that viewpoint I shall support this measure. And I shall support it from another viewpoint and upon another ground, and that is that it will aid and encourage the local communities and municipalities to construct such roads as they will be able to get a rental for them from the Federal Government for their use. It will greatly encourage good road building. To take the position that the Federal Government should not pay rental for the roads it uses in transmitting whatever mail matter it has, is to take the position that the Federal Government should "sponge" upon the States and the various municipalities in the use of their roads. Is the United States Government a beggar?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. What would the gentleman say to the Government discontinuing the use of these roads, if they have got to pay $25 a mile?

Mr. POWERS. In further answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL] I desire to say this: That the gentleman seems to forget, and other Members seem to forget, that we are all citizens of one great country; that we are all citizens of the United States as well as citizens of the States. And whether this money is to be paid by the States and the various municipalities direct in the building of these roads or whether they are built by us as citizens of the United States, what matters it? They have to be built. It does not seem to me to make a very great difference whether we are taxed as citizens of the United States or as citizens of the States. We have got to be taxed. If the local authorities can accomplish the big task of road building better when aided by the strong arm of the Government, why withhold the aid?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. What would the gentleman say to the United States Government going into all the cities and paying for all the asphalt pavement for the streets and for the laying of the sidewalks that the agents of the Government travel over?

Mr. POWERS. That proposition on the part of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL] is in a way an absurd proposition, but from one viewpoint it would be a just proposition. The distinguished gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] the other day made the argument that to carry this Federal aid to its logical conclusion, when the United States Government sent a United States marshal down into a moonshine district for the purpose of taking into custody some violator of the revenue laws, the Federal Government ought to pay for the use of the roads.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Is not the gentleman for that? It would help Kentucky.

Mr. POWERS. One moment. And, carried to its logical conclusion, it would mean that and carried to its logical conclusion it would include that. I have no right and you have no right and the Federal Government has no right to use any other man's property for a time, long or short, much or little, without paying for the use of that property. But such a scheme is impracticable. Nobody, so far as I know, is advocating a thing of that character. But it is practicable that Uncle Sam pay for the use of a road which he uses over 300 days in a year or for any specifically stated number of times.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Is $25 a mile a reasonable rental for one horse and one old rig, driving over the road once a day?

Mr. POWERS. In my judgment, the terms are too high in this bill. They ought to be cut in half; and, in my judgment, another class of roads, known as class D, ought to be included. For instance, if the Government pays $25 for the use of class A road, it will pay at the rate of about $2 a trip for a length of 24 miles. That is too much. I am not in favor of putting it that high. It ought to be cut in two, in my judgment.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Would not 25 cents or 50 cents a trip be fair toll?

Mr. POWERS. I do not know whether it would or not, but I think the provisions in this bill are too high.

Mr. LEVER. That is what it would be on a low-grade road.

Mr. POWERS. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL] if he is in favor of any toll at all?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I am not in favor of any toll whatever. The rural routes were established as a blessing and a benefit to the people of the country, and it was provided they should have their roads in proper condition before the routes were established, and now, when they have got the rural free delivery established they demand $25 a mile, and the gentleman says it is in the right direction. It is an attempt to get the Federal Government to build all the roads throughout the country, and I think that is what the gentleman meant by "right direction."

Mr. POWERS. I can not yield for a speech on the part of the gentleman; but I want to remind him when he takes the position that the rural routes have been established as a matter of favor, that he is wrong. The rural routes have been established not as a matter of favor but as a matter of common justice to the people who live in the country. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. They are a favor. They do not pay for themselves, and therefore are not engaged in a profitable business.

Mr. POWERS. Neither is the War or Navy Department. The argument has been made that this is an unconstitutional provision, this provision of Federal aid to good roads; that the Federal Government has no right to pass a law of this character. I am not a constitutional lawyer. I do not assume to instruct the Members of this House on what is or is not constitutional law; but I want to say this: Under Article I of the Federal Constitution, section 8, the Federal Congress has the right to appropriate money for the establishment of post offices and post roads. There is no specific grant in the Constitution empowering Congress to appropriate money for the purpose of paying rent for the use of buildings in which to locate post offices.

The United States Government owns comparatively few of the buildings in this country in which are located United States post offices. The Government rents or leases most of them. It has been doing that since the beginning of the Government.

The Government can not afford to build a public building at every crossroads where a post office is located.

There is no specific grant in the Constitution empowering the Government to lease buildings for certain times on certain terms for the purpose of locating United States post offices therein; and yet nobody denies that the Federal Government has that right. Nobody questions the right and the power of the Federal Government to build public roads over which to carry its mails.

The Constitution says that the Federal Government has got a right to establish post roads. If it has got the right to establish post roads, it has got the right to lease roads and it has got the right to pay for the use of roads, just the same as it has got the right to provide for the location, building, leasing, and renting of buildings in which to locate its post offices.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] raised the point this morning that there is a wide difference between the rivers—that character of highways—and the road highways. He made the point that the United States Government owns the land under the water in the river beds of this great country. I do not understand the law to be that. I understand that, so far as the sunshine of heaven is concerned, so far as the air we breathe is concerned, so far as the use of the water is concerned, or the use of water as a public highway is concerned, we all have the right to the use of them.

But nobody would make the contention that a man owns the air simply because he has got the right to breathe the air. Nobody would make the contention that any man under any Government owns the air or the sunshine because that man has got the right to breathe the air and bask in the sunshine. We have the right to use as public highways the great rivers of the country; but the Government, so far as my understanding of it goes, does not own the river beds or the water in the rivers.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. POWERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LANGLEY. If the gentleman will permit, the Federal Government merely has supervision of the navigable rivers. It has taken jurisdiction of them, and it can take jurisdiction of the post roads in the same way?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Why do you not eliminate your State lines and admit that you are not States because you do not perform the functions of States?

Mr. POWERS. This bill does not infringe upon or interfere with any State rights, unless they are already interfered with by the Government in sending mail all over this country. [Applause.]

This bill is for the purpose of extending to the rural districts some of the things to which they have long since been entitled in common justice and in common fairness. [Applause.] Where have the great appropriations gone that this Congress appropriates from year to year and from time to time? Has that money gone to the rural districts? Have they in any of these appropriations been specifically provided for or specially cared for?

Away back yonder in 1882—30 years ago—the Congress of the United States appropriated for that year over $11,000,000 for rivers and harbors, $14,566,638 for naval service, $3,379,571 for the District of Columbia, $26,687,800 for the support of the Army, $68,282,307 for pensions, and how much for the Agriculture Department? The puny sum of only $335,500. Out of a total appropriation for all purposes that year of $179,579,000, the small sum appropriated for the Agriculture Department shows how little was spent to specially benefit the farmer. Ten years later, in 1892, our total appropriations had increased to $323,783,079 for that year. Of this sum, $2,951,200 was appropriated for rivers and harbors, but over $25,000,000 had been appropriated for them the year before; $31,541,645 went for the naval service, $5,597,125 to the District of Columbia, $24,613,529 to the support of the army, $135,214,785 for pensions, and only $3,028,153 for the Agriculture Department.

In 1911, last year, our total appropriations amounted to $663,725,794; $49,380,541 went to rivers and harbors, $131,410,568 went to the Navy, $95,440,567 went to the Army, $10,608,045 went to the District of Columbia, $155,758,000 went for pensions, and only $13,487,636 went to the Agriculture Department.

I do not have the figures just now at my command, but everybody knows that for years the Government has been spending millions of dollars in the erection of customhouses and other public buildings in the various class cities throughout the length and breadth of the land.

This money has been spent for the convenience and accommodation of the people who live in the cities and not for the convenience and accommodation of the people who live in the country. The people who live in the towns and in the country have all these years been paying their full share of the taxes and assuming without complaint their full share of the burdens of running this Government, while the benefits and blessings have gone largely to others. This Congress now has an opportunity to do something for the people who live in the smaller towns, the country, and the rural districts.

If the present Congress will pass this bill, whereby the people living on or near rural routes in the country get cheaper postage on those routes than is accorded to those living in the cities and elsewhere, and will at the same time enact into law that provision of the bill whereby the Federal Government shall pay a just rental for its use of the State and country roads and thereby give aid and encouragement to the crying need of our times, the construction and maintenance of good roads throughout the land, much will have been done to remedy the wrongs done the rural population in the past and all to the glory and betterment of our common country. Your armies, your navies, your fortifications, your rivers, and your harbors, and your pensions, and your Federal buildings——

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Do not they get their equal share of all these improvements?

Mr. POWERS. Oh, no. They do not get their equal share of all these improvements.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. And do not they get the same share of the public defense that the cities get?

Mr. POWERS. These public buildings that are erected in the various cities of the country are largely erected for the convenience of the people living in those cities, and not for the convenience or comfort of the people living in the country.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman now yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. POWERS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman's idea is that if an appropriation is made as proposed in this bill it is to repay the local communities for money and labor expended in making these roads passable and more convenient?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. LOBECK. And thus lessen the cost of transportation of the farmers' heavy products—their grain, and all that—so that indirectly it will lessen the cost of living in the larger cities?

Mr. POWERS. It will have that effect.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. And you want to make the Government pay toll to the farmers for carrying their own products to market.

Mr. LOBECK. I believe in having good roads in this country and thus lessen the cost of products.

Mr. FOCHT. I wish to say that I am heartily in favor of the Government constructing public roads at the proper time and for the proper purpose, but I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether he conceives of this bill reimbursing the States or counties or townships for the construction of public highways in such a way that he would regard it as involving the reimbursement to the State of Pennsylvania, for example, of $5,000,000 which that State had expended on public highways?

Mr. POWERS. I would say in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it is not a reimbursement at all. From the passage of this bill and from that time on the States and various subdivisions are to be paid by the Federal Government for the use of their public roads for the purpose of carrying the United States mails; and if the State of Pennsylvania has expended millions of dollars upon its public highways, if it has a splendid system of roads, if it stands superior to other States in that respect, Pennsylvania will reap the reward by having its roads now in such a condition that the rental will be paid at once by the Federal Government for the use of those roads in the transmission of the mails.

Mr. LEVER. Is it not proposed to do in this bill the fair and equitable thing of paying to the States and corporations exactly what they have furnished the Government?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly; that and nothing more.

Mr. LEVER. If they have given the Government a good road, the Government will pay them accordingly; and if they have given the Government a bad road, they will get little?

Mr. POWERS. That states the case clearly.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. POWERS. Yes, sir; with pleasure.

Mr. LANGLEY. Reference has been made to the expense that might be incurred by the Federal Government in carrying out this or any other scheme similar to it——

Mr. POWERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LANGLEY. Does not the gentleman find from his investigation of the subject that whatever that expense may be it is a comparatively small matter compared with the cost of transportation over bad roads? In other words, that the cost to the Federal Government will be many times recompensed in the resulting benefits to the people, and especially to the farmers, who have had far too little consideration from the Government?

Mr POWERS. The gentleman is correct; and whatever is a saving to the citizens who constitute the Government is a saving to the Government. Whatever helps one helps the other.

This is fair legislation. It is just legislation. It is legislation in which the people I have the honor to represent are vitally concerned.

I believe this House will pass, possibly with some amendments, the good-roads provision in this bill. I hope it will pass, with some needed amendments, this experimental parcel-post legislation. The parcel-post legislation as provided for in this bill will help the country farmer. It could be so amended as to help him more. It will not hurt, but ought to benefit, the country merchant. This bill ought to be so amended that the commission to be appointed under its provisons shall have the power to investigate, not only the general parcel post but the postal express and the railway express, to the end that just and fair and wholesome legislation may be recommended. It should make its report on or before Congress commences in December so the people can get the relief to which they are justly entitled.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the New York Press is one of the leading newspapers of this country—fearless, able, progressive, and always advocating reform measures in the interest of all the people. For years it has been the earnest and consistent champion of a general parcel post, and never misses an opportunity to keep the people informed regarding the progress that is being made to enact legislation to place upon the statute books a general parcel-post law.

In this connection I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read in my time an editorial from the New York Press, of Friday, April 26 instant.

The Clerk read as follows:

PARCEL POST IN THE SHADOW.

It is unfortunate that the marine disaster which has agonized the world for the last 10 days, and the inquiry thereinto by a Senate committee at Washington, should chance to overshadow in the newspaper reports the debate in the House of Representatives on the parcel-post legislation pending.

If the enemies of the parcel post had calculated the time when the facts in support of the parcel post would be buried in the pages of the CONGRESSSIONAL RECORD and dismissed with scant paragraphs in publications widely circulated they could not have chosen a better period to obscure the argument in behalf of parcel-post facilities than one made so inopportune by an act of God.

Nevertheless, the reasons in detail why the parcel post should be established in the United States mail service are going to be thoroughly understood by all the people when the country is made acquainted with the facts set forth in the Congress debates. Already the public appreciation of the advantages to be gained by increasing the limit of fourth-class matter to 11 pounds with a cut in the prohibitive postage rate is widespread. It is so keen, even though the debate on the Sulzer amendment was almost ignored while interest centered on the tragedy of the Titanic, that no Representative whose vote reveals his sympathy with the express monopoly can hope to excuse himself to the voters when he is up for reelection.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, that editorial speaks for itself, and I am glad to put it in the RECORD as a part of the literature on this debate for a general parcel post.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman wish to use some of his time?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I have some gentlemen who wish to be recognized in order to extend their remarks.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. An order has already been made to allow gentlemen who have spoken to extend their remarks, and those who have not made remarks will be permitted to print.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Then I do not desire to occupy further time now.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Then I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, on April 15 I introduced in this body a resolution providing for the consideration of the bill making compensation for the use of post roads as an amendment to the Post Office Appropriation bill. This resolution was favorably reported by the Committee on Rules and adopted in the House by a large majority. It is in the following terms:

House resolution 494.

Resolved, That after the adoption of this rule it shall be in order in the consideration of H. R. 21279, a bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, to consider the amendment to said bill hereafter to be mentioned, notwithstanding the general rules of the House.

On page 25, at the end of line 8, the following to be inserted:

"That for the purposes of this act certain highways of the several States, and the civil subdivisions thereof, are classified as follows:

"Class A shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide composed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam, graded, crowned, compacted, and maintained in such manner that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface, and all other roads having a road track not less than 9 feet wide of a construction equally smooth, firm, durable, and expensive, and continuously kept in proper repair. Class B shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface. Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times. That whenever the United States shall use any highway of any State, or civil subdivision thereof, which falls within classes A, B, or C, for the purpose of transporting rural mail, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile for highways of class A, $20 per annum per mile for highways of class B, and $15 per annum per mile for highways of class C. The United States shall not pay any compensation or toll for such use of such highways other than that provided for in this section, and shall pay no compensation whatever for the use of any highway not falling within classes A, B, or C. That any question arising as to the proper classification of any road used for transporting rural mail shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. That the compensation herein provided for shall be paid at the end of each fiscal year by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Postmaster General to the officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act.

"The provisions of this paragraph shall go into effect on the 1st day of July, 1913."

Mr. Chairman, the era of national aid to state roads has arrived, and whatever form the opposition to that policy may take, whether the form of constitutional quibbles, or the form of freak or humorous amendments, such as propositions to pay for the use of the sidewalks in the cities, or the form of amendment ostensibly in aid of the bill, but really an embarrassment to the true friends of the measure, who have labored in season, and out of season to put this principle into working shape, these efforts one and all will be found as futile to stop the progress of this movement, as Mother Partington's mop proved to be as a weapon of defense, in her famous contest with the encroaching waves of the Atlantic Ocean. This bill rests upon constitutional authority, and its operation will interfere with no single one of those state functions, whose beauties and merits have been so eloquently acclaimed by some of the participants in this debate.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] spoke of the delight with which he paid his local taxes in aid of good roads. It is not proposed to interfere with the exquisite pleasure of that experience, or to take anything from its felicitous charm. Under this bill he may not only continue to pay local taxes with all the pleasurable emotions attendant on that operation, but when so minded he may increase the measure of his delight in that process, by increasing his contributions to the roads of his community. There is not a friend of this amendment who will seek to hinder him from pursuing this charming, this patriotic course, of aiding local enterprise, in the rôle of a cheerful giver.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] spoke of this measure as interfering in some wise, not very clearly depicted, with the functions of the States, and as tending toward centralization. I do not recall that New England was affected with this form of apprehension, when we passed the law for the White Mountain Reserve, a proposition for an expenditure of public money which rests upon a far more insufficient foundation, whether in reason, or in the Constitution, than the proposition to aid the construction and maintenance of post roads in the States, by means of a national appropriation. Many gentlemen who have criticized the pending proposition, have very clearly shown by the nature and character of their criticism, that they are absolutely unacquainted with the terms, the purport, and the purpose of this measure.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] in the course of his remarks, referred with just pride to the liberal attitude of his people toward the cause of good roads, and the extent of the local contributions in aid of that cause. We are mindful of the fact that many States in this Union have done splendid work in this direction.

The thrill of the movement for betterment of roads, is being felt in every State, and I rejoice that it is so. But may I ask my friend from Texas, and the other gentlemen from the other States who have assailed this measure, how and wherein, will a supplemental fund derived from the National Treasury by direct appropriation, paralyze local effort, or hinder the work of local development?

In many of the States, notably in my own, the roads are established and maintained by local taxation, with an auxiliary state fund that is afforded upon prescribed conditions. Just a moment ago I was talking with a Member from New Jersey, and he mentioned the fact that in his State, as in Virginia, the county and local contributions to the road fund were supplemented by state aid. In that instance did state aid paralyze the arm of the community? Did state aid cause a recession of local activities? On the contrary, as a direct and immediate result of cooperation of effort, the State of New Jersey affords a most splendid illustration of what can be done by united endeavor in the way of securing good roads of the highest type. When county aid is supplemented with state aid, and state aid is supplemented with national aid, pray tell me why this aggregate aid may not be efficiently employed, or why national aid will operate to paralyze local endeavor, when state aid has merely served to energize it? In the great fight now in progress in the Mississippi Valley between the States, and the Father of Waters, do the States disdain the help of the Nation on the ground of its paralyzing effect on local activities, and local contributions?

There is no great nation of the modern world which has not aided the local communities in respect both of construction and maintenance of highways, and the nations pursuing this policy are noted for the excellence of their roads. In this regard the Republic of France is the wonder of the civilized nations. But to achieve her present state of supremacy in the matter of improved highways France, as a nation, has spent over 3,000,000,000 francs upon her roads. This fact explains in large measure the present prosperity of that country. A few days ago the French Government called on its people for bids on a bond issue of $60,000,000. In the briefest possible time bids aggregating over $400,000,000 were received. Comment is unnecessary. To-day France, which has done so magnificently in the direction of national aid to roads, has in contemplation a scheme of canalization of her rivers. This is but another form of domestic improvement in aid of internal commerce, and like her roads, these canals will further increase the commercial facilities and aggregate wealth of that wise and thrifty people.

Why should this great nation, a nation that in other respects stands in the very forefront of the nations, hesitate to pursue a course that has been pursued in other countries with such splendid results? Is our authority to enact this measure questioned? Consider for a moment the authority of the Federal Government over rivers and harbors. The National Government exercises at present the right to regulate the height of bridges over navigable streams, to determine whether these bridges shall be built, to provide that bridges if built, may be built by private corporations, with the right to charge tolls, to provide for the taking of private property to afford approaches to the bridges, to provide that feeders leading into channels of interstate commerce may be constructed, and to that end that the land of private parties may be condemned.

These are great powers. Whence are they derived? From any express grant of authority in terms, in the Constitution? Not at all. All of this gigantic power, so freely used at times, is derived from the commercial power, the power to regulate commerce among the States. Under authority of that clause, Congress has spent over $600,000,000, on the improvement of rivers and harbors, on lighthouses, and warning signals. The power to do these things is not given by express grant. In the case of post roads the Constitution declares that Congress shall have the power to "establish post roads, and post offices." But the power to dredge rivers and harbors, to control navigable streams, and to provide for the construction of interstate bridges, or bridges over navigable rivers entirely within one State, has been derived by subtle judicial construction from the simple declaration of the Constitution that the Congress may regulate commerce among the several States. Apart from the clause relating to post roads, the Congress has the power under the commerce clause, as it is now construed, to construct, improve, and maintain interstate highways by water, or by land, and the further power to construct, improve, and maintain, any and all public highways by water, or by land, which connect with, or intersect, or lead into such interstate highways, if these works are deemed essential to the regulation of commerce. The fact that Congress has not put into exercise its right to regulate commerce between the States, by the construction and improvement of highways across, and in the several States, does not argue that this power does not exist.

In the case of Mobile v. Kimball (162 U. S., p. 685), involving the question of the right of Alabama to enact a law for certain improvements in the harbor of Mobile, Justice Field declared that:

> Inaction of Congress on these subjects, unlike inaction upon matters affecting all the States, and requiring uniformity of regulation, is not taken as a declaration that nothing shall be done with respect to them, but is rather to be deemed a declaration that for the time being, and until Congress chooses to act, they may be regulated by State authority.

In the case of Clinton Bridge (10 Wall., 454), Justice Wilson held that the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, includes the control of the navigable waters of the United States, so far as may be necessary to secure their free navigation, and by navigable waters of the United States are meant such as are navigable in fact, and which by themselves, or their connection with other waters, form a continuous channel for commerce with foreign countries, or among the States.

In Luxton v. North River Bridge Co. (153 U. S., 525), construing an act authorizing the construction of a bridge between New York, and New Jersey, and making it a post road, the court held that:

> Congress may create corporations as appropriate means of executing the powers of government, as for instance, a bank to carry on fiscal operations in the United States, or a railroad corporation for the purpose of promoting commerce among the States.

Congress being empowered to regulate commerce between the States, and pass all laws needful to carry into execution any of the powers specifically conferred, may make use of any appropriate means to that end. To such an extent is this principle carried, that it is declared that—

> Whenever it becomes necessary for the accomplishment of any object within the authority of Congress to exercise the right of eminent domain, and take private lands, making just compensation to the owner, Congress may do this with, or without a concurrent act of the State in which the land lies. (Van Blocklin v. Tennessee, 117 U. S., 154.)

In Indiana v. United States (148 U. S., p. 148) we find the following:

> Congress has likewise the power exercised early in this century by successive acts in the case of the Cumberland, or National Road from the Atlantic across the Alleghanies to Ohio, to authorize the construction of a public highway, connecting several States.

Of course if such a highway may be authorized and constructed, highways leading into this highway, and forming thereby a continuous channel of commerce, may also be constructed under this and other authority. In California v. The Pacific Railroad (127 U. S.), it was adjudged that Congress has authority in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce among the several States, to authorize corporations to construct railroads across the States, as well as the Territories of the United States. In this connection Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the court, is quoted:

> It can not be doubted at the present day that Congress under the power to regulate commerce among the several States, as well as to provide for postal accommodations, and military exigencies has authority to pass these laws. The power to construct, or to authorize corporations, or individuals to construct national highways, and bridges from State to State, is essential to the complete control, and regulation of interstate commerce.
> Without authority in Congress to establish such highways and bridges, it would be without authority to regulate one of the most important adjuncts of commerce. This power was exercised in former times to a very limited extent, the Cumberland or National Road being the notable example. Its exertion was but little called for, as commerce was then mostly conducted by water, and many of our statesmen entertained doubts as to the existence of the power to establish ways of communication by land.
> But since in consequence of the expansion of our country, the multiplication of its products, and the invention of railroads, and locomotion by steam, land transportation has so vastly increased, a sounder consideration of the subject has prevailed, and led to the conclusion that Congress has plenary power over the whole subject.

These citations would seem to afford conclusive authority for the proposition that Congress enjoys the right under the commerce clause to construct, and maintain in any portion of the Union, roads that are a part of a general scheme of regulation of commerce, and as such, and to that end, parts of an interstate highway. This power is enjoyed altogether apart from the power to establish post roads. It is the power to construct, or have constructed highways, for the complete regulation, and control of commerce.

So that the authority of the Federal Government to construct and maintain roads may be referred to the power to regulate commerce. But there is another provision of the Constitution to which this power may be more directly and immediately related, namely the clause affording the Congress the express power to establish post roads. There is no need to interpret this section. It carries its own meaning plainly and obviously. When this power to establish is once exercised, jurisdiction over the roads established, attaches forthwith, along with the obligation of maintenance, as a national function. The extent of Federal authority over post roads, established by mere use, and not by construction, was settled in the famous Debs case.

Whatever may have been the real attitude of the "fathers of the Constitution", toward the actual construction of roads across the States, and within the States, with the incidents of Federal jurisdiction and control, whatever they may have had in mind as the real meaning, and the definite limits, of the words used relating to the commercial power, and the establishment of post roads, that meaning, and that attitude are no longer more than a moot question. The accumulated decisions which I have cited in part, decisions rendered in a long course of interpretation of our organic law, make it abundantly clear, that to-day Congress may not only build and maintain post roads under the clause to that effect, but under the commercial power may construct highways across the States, or permit them to be constructed, and then provide for feeders within the States, retaining over the whole system Federal jurisdiction and control, and maintaining the same at the national expense.

These great works Congress could justify as being not only within its powers, but as promoting that general welfare contemplated by the Constitution, so that if our power to enact the pending bill, and afford the payments provided, is challenged, our answer is ample. We are far short, and designedly so, of exercising the powers that might be called into operation. Every feature of Federal control over state roads, or interference with state, or local functions, has been carefully eliminated. The Congress if so disposed, might establish and control an elaborate system of national roads. It is satisfied to use existing roads, and afford compensation for that use. To exercise its undoubted powers to the fullest extent, would entail vast expense, arouse antagonisms, and create friction in the States and local communities. Foregoing the ultimate exercise of these powers, it is content under the proposed measure to utilize only so much of them as may be needed to enable it to extend effective aid to the maintenance of the general system of post roads now in use, for transporting rural mails in the United States. This is a conservative measure and ought to appeal to conservative minds. Should this plan be rejected, a more objectionable and radical one might be adopted in the near future.

A feature of unusual merit in this measure, is the just discrimination with which its aid is afforded. While the largest measure of aid is extended to the communities which in largest measure have aided themselves, a helping hand is tendered at the same time to the communities which are willing, but unable to construct, or maintain, improved highways with the slender resources at their command. States that show the largest mileage of improved roads falling in class A, or class B, will receive the larger rentals provided for roads in those classes, and as compared with other States, a proportionately greater total payment. The lowest rental is provided for the great aggregate of roads embraced in class C.

Communities that have built good roads, will find their reward in this bill. Communities that desire to build goods roads, will be encouraged to go forward. Every community will be stimulated to construct more hard roads, and to transform existing dirt roads into improved highways, in order to receive the larger compensation attaching to permanent roads falling in the two first classes. The critics of this measure seem to fancy that the roads of the States are to be exclusively constructed, or maintained, by the appropriation which it carries. Nothing of the sort. It is merely a supplement to local efforts. A permanent road on which the State spends $25 per mile, per annum, for maintenance, may not be very adequately maintained by that expenditure. But the expenditure of $50 per annum, per mile, may be ample for efficient maintenance. It is the purpose of this bill to afford the additional $25.

The cost of maintenance for a well-constructed dirt road, depends upon a number of factors, and is a fluctuating quantity. Many of these roads can be well maintained during a large portion of the year, on an expenditure of $10 per annum, per mile, and admirably maintained on an expenditure of $25 per annum, per mile. This bill will afford $15 per mile, and the local authorities will be required to provide the additional amount needed to maintain the road to the prescribed standard.

The State of New York will be entitled to something like $1,000,000 per year when its roads are conformed to the requirements of this measure. Will the gentlemen from that State who either directly, or indirectly, are opposing this plan of national aid to state roads, undertake to tell this House that this large sum will be rejected, or that if received as a supplement to state contributions, it will not give impetus to the state and local activities in the great cause of road improvement?

The State of Texas is interested in this measure to the extent of about $800,000 per annum. That great State boasts of what it has done in the way of road building, and it is conceded that its record in this respect is altogether creditable. Will the Representatives from Texas tell this House that the sum of $800,000 as an addition to their state and local contributions, is a negligible item, or that once in hand this considerable sum, will not energize and stimulate the whole scheme of road building in that State? If road building is a state function, a material increase of road funds will induce a more efficient discharge of that function. Throughout the Union, in every State, and in every community, the stimulating effect of the compensation contemplated by this bill will be noticeably felt. The sentiment of the country favors permanent roads, or hard roads as they are sometimes styled, and the general tendency is toward their construction, but for the present many communities are unable to build them. During the transition era, and until the existing roads are replaced by the ultimate form of permanent roads, the dirt roads should be maintained in the form most suitable for efficient use. Hence the provision of the bill in aid of dirt roads.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. The gentleman has made reference to the fact that under the provisions of this bill he estimates that Texas will get about $800,000 annually.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Can the gentleman give us any estimate as to how much burden it will be upon the people in order to get that $800,000 into the Federal Treasury?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I can not. All money raised through taxation is derived from the people, but I am not prepared to say what it costs to put $800,000 into the Federal Treasury.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Has not the gentleman frequently argued that in order to get one dollar into the Federal Treasury by the present system of taxation, the people have to bear a burden of from five to ten dollars?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, Mr. Chairman, I have never made that argument. If the State of Texas, or any other State represented upon this floor, has any scruples with respect to receiving the amount to which it will be entitled under the bill, permit me to say to these gentlemen that there are other States that will gladly undertake to relieve them from that embarrassment. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, my friend's argument goes further than he might be disposed to extend it, and has other applications that he might be unwilling to make. I might ask him how much does it cost the people of the whole country to raise the money that has been expended for the purpose of destroying the boll weevil in the State of Texas? [Applause.] Did he favor the expedition that was sent to Central American to secure a species of ant supposed to have a blood feud with the elusive weevil, and to pursue him with unrelenting and implacable hostility? The gentleman from Texas might well be asked how much does it cost the public, the general mass of taxpayers, to raise the money that has been used to improve the rivers and harbors of his State? I have no information that Texas has declined to receive the benefits of that expenditure. Upon what theory of the Constitution do gentlemen justify expenditures for these objects, while they assail appropriations for roads with flouts and jeers? That instrument does not even mention the boll weevil, and is strangely reticent as to rivers and harbors.

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] made a vigorous attack upon this bill, and likened the Government when paying the rentals for which it provides, to Santa Claus, distributing gifts at Christmas. I understand that Uncle Sam on one occasion played the rôle of Santa Claus to the little hamlet of Sundance in Wyoming, and handed over a Christmas package in the form of a public building, without any protest from that State. [Applause.]

It is doubtless true that Uncle Sam has distributed his gifts to some unworthy recipients. His activities are manifold. He is building roads and other public works in many quarters of the world. He has played the part of Santa Claus to the Porto Ricans, the Panamans, the Filipinos, to the rivers and harbors to the extent of $600,000,000, and to the railroads in aid of their development by donations of public lands aggregating over 197,000,000 acres. It is now proposed that he shall play Santa Claus for the benefit of the American farmers. Is there objection? [Applause.]

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I do not want to needlessly consume the gentleman's time——

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am willing to yield.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. The gentleman has replied to a statement I made. Would it interfere with the gentleman's course of remarks if I quoted here a statement by a very distinguished Virginian?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, not at all.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. It is a letter written by Mr. Thomas Jefferson to Mr. Madison:

> Have you considered all the consequences of your proposition respecting post roads? I view it as a source of boundless patronage to the Executive, jobbing to Members of Congress and their friends, and a bottomless abyss of public money. You will begin by only appropriating the surplus of the post-office revenues; but the other revenues will soon be called in to their aid, and it will be a scene of eternal scramble among the Members who can get the most money wasted in their State, and they will always get most who are meanest.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will give the gentleman a declaration of Democratic principles somewhat later than that of Mr. Jefferson, and one which he has possibly overlooked.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Can the gentleman give a declaration of Democratic principles that is better than Mr. Jefferson's?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I think so, on this subject at least. [Applause.]

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Very well.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The Democratic platform of 1908 contains the following plank:

> We favor Federal aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads.

[Applause.]

I might say that the pending proposition is not the one criticized by Mr. Jefferson. This proposition confers no patronage upon the President, affords no opportunity of jobbing the Members of Congress, and does not open a "bottomless abyss of expenditure." The limits of expenditure are carefully fixed, and no money will be expended under its provisions until, and unless, the roads to which they relate, conform to the standards prescribed.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, with pleasure.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Can the gentleman explain why there is no provision in this bill stipulating that this money that is to be paid by the Federal Government shall be used for the purpose of construction and maintenance of public roads? In other words, is not the gentleman familiar with the fact that the friends of this measure have refused to incorporate in this bill a provision that it shall be used for the purpose designated in the Democratic platform.

Mr. SAUNDERS. When the gentleman and myself studied law, we learned a maxim to the following effect: That is certain, which can be rendered certain. Id certum est, quod certum reddi potest. Under the provisions of our bill, it is sufficiently certain that the money which it appropriates will be applied upon the public roads. [Applause.]

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield? Is not the gentleman in favor of the bill stipulating the use that shall be made of this money?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No further than it does in its present form. It is sufficiently explicit on that point.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Why not?

Mr. SAUNDERS. For the very reason that under the terms of the bill the roads must be maintained to a prescribed standard as a condition precedent to the right of the localities to receive these rentals.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Then why not say so?

Mr. SAUNDERS. The bill says so, substantially and sufficiently.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Why not say so in direct terms?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Well, it is sufficiently stated, and when a thing is stated sufficiently I believe that is tantamount to a direct statement.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion right on that point?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. JACKSON. We have in our State, in one of the counties, and I think more than one, the case of a railroad which is practically owned by the municipality and State. We have to have some bridges and approaches over which the railroad passes. Does not the gentleman think it is entirely consistent now that these railroads which belong to the municipality, these bridges, and so forth, should receive, or rather the municipality should receive, their share of the mail contracts that pass over them, and this law is on all fours in principle with that proposition, that the county and State railroads should receive their share of the money paid for mail contracts?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Precisely. The gentleman's interruption suggests one detail to which I wished to advert a moment ago, and that is the suggestion that this bill should provide payment for the streets and sidewalks used in the cities by the city and other carriers. I am not acquainted with the laws of any State that provide that state appropriations in aid of good roads shall be expended upon the streets and sidewalks of the municipalities. In my own State there is a state appropriation in aid of roads, that is pro-rated among the counties. This amount is derived from the general taxes, and not a cent of it is expended in any city of the State.

The reason for this is that the cities, as a result of the charters of incorporation which they derive from the State, are supposed to have distinct advantages over the rural and unincorporated communities. The legislature confers these charters upon them, and in consideration of this fact, as well as of the further fact that the cities are directly benefited by the improvement of the highways, it is believed that the general assembly is justified in applying the road fund exclusively to rural roads. The cities recognize their immediate interest in road improvement, and afford generous aid in this direction. The commercial interests of the cities are effectively promoted by any general improvement in the means of commercial communication.

Mr. MADDEN. What would the gentleman say in cases where the cities make no contributions to the local authorities for the construction of roads?

Mr. SAUNDERS. That does not affect the question. The roads in those States would still receive their appropriate aid under the pending bill which my friend is opposing. I simply used the illustration in respect of state aid to show that in applying the benefits of this bill exclusively to rural roads, we are following the analogy of the States which do not apply state aid to streets and sidewalks, and to show further by the experience of the States, that national aid will not paralyze local endeavor, that it will be a help not a hindrance.

Mr. MADDEN. In the State of Illinois the State makes no contribution whatever either to the country road or city street. All of the streets are built by assessment against the abutting property, and all the highways are built in the same manner.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Did not your last national platform advocate national aid to roads?

Mr. MADDEN. They simply contemplated state aid.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Do you mean to say that when your platform uses the following language—

> We recognize the social and economic advantages of good country roads, maintained more, and more largely at public expense, and less and less at the expense of the abutting property owner—it merely meant to say to the people of the country that you favored state aid in the construction, and maintenance of country roads?

Mr. MADDEN. Read the platform.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Do you mean to say that was all you meant by this plank of your platform?

Mr. MADDEN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. If the gentleman from Illinois and his party are satisfied to juggle with words after that fashion, then it is easy to understand why the voters repudiated that party at the last election. You were writing a national platform for the purposes of a national campaign, and the plain and ordinary sense, and necessary implication of the words used, constitute a sufficient declaration in favor of national aid to roads. The next sentence merely commends what the States are doing and have done, in aid of roads. It is not a declaration of principle, or party attitude. Now when the gentleman is confronted with his platform, he repudiates its obvious meaning, and declares that it does not mean what it plainly and manifestly intends. No wonder the country repudiated your party. It will repudiate any party that says one thing in its platform and means another.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman do the House the kindness to read what the platform says?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have read it. I read it this morning, and I will now reproduce the sentence to which the gentleman evidently refers:

> In this work we commend the growing practice of State aid, and we approve the efforts of the Agricultural Department by experiment, and otherwise, to make clear to the public, the best methods of road construction.

We too commend what the States have done, and the purpose of this bill is to enable them to discharge a local function, so called, in a more efficient manner. Does the gentleman speak for his side of the House in the interpretation which he has placed on the Republican platform? Are you all agreed that your platform merely intended to pat the States on the back, and to compliment them on what they had done in aid of roads?

Reverting to the citation from Mr. Jefferson's writings submitted by the gentleman from Texas, I wish to say that Mr. Jefferson's attitude toward national aid to roads was largely the attitude of his day. The same constitutional objections which were urged against appropriations for highways, were invoked against appropriations for rivers and harbors. But appropriations for the latter objects, have become a fixed policy of this Government, and the objection to this expenditure on constitutional grounds, is no longer urged. The Constitution of to-day, is not the Constitution as Mr. Jefferson understood it. The powers of the Federal Government under that instrument have been immensely enlarged by successive decisions of the Supreme Court. In a sense the Constitution has been rewritten.

Mr. Jefferson's suggestion that appropriations for roads, would lead to a scramble among the Members to secure the most money to be wasted in their respective States, is a suggestion of far-reaching significance. If accepted as a principle of general application, it would serve to eliminate many present forms of national activities which are regarded as essential to our national progress, and domestic development. It would bring appropriations for rivers and harbors, for internal waterways, and coastwise canals to a summary halt. It would require a cessation of our activities in the matter of public buildings. The argument that appropriations for roads will open a "bottomless abyss," once conceded to be sound, is equally potent against appropriations for rivers and harbors, and public buildings. Mr. Chairman shall we refrain from action that is admitted to be moderate and constitutional, lest our successors in their day, shall take action that will be both immoderate and unconstitutional? We are charged with present duties. In their own time our successors must work out the problems of their day and generation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I would like the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] to give me a few minutes more—10 minutes, say.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have not the time. I would be glad to yield it if I could. I suppose, on account of one gentleman having dropped out of the debate, I could give the gentleman from Virginia five minutes additional.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Very well. I will take five minutes. Mr. Chairman, whenever any new form of expenditure is suggested, there are always some gentlemen who shiver with apprehension of approaching disaster, and vehemently suggest that such a policy will bankrupt the Treasury. That argument has been made and insisted upon with respect to the effect of the pending amendment. And yet it is undoubtedly true, that no nation has ever bankrupted itself by voluntary contributions to works of internal development. Consider for a moment the great countries of the world with their staggering burdens of public debt. The public debt of Great Britain is $3,669,931,350, of France $5,898,675,451, of Russia 4,558,152,565, of Italy $2,602,299,757, of Austria-Hungary $1,063,725,105, of Japan $1,287,604,261. The figures are appalling and they tell a story of insensate and incredible folly. These gigantic sums represent chiefly either indebtedness for wars that are past, or preparations for wars to come. It is only when you touch the pride of a nation, it is only when you play on the apprehensions of a people, it is only when you arouse the fears of the timid, or quicken the pulse of vaulting ambition, that burdens are lightly assumed which in the result retard the progress of civilization in its happiest and most attractive forms. Education, waterways, commerce, roads, everything is starved to pay for mighty armies and fleets of huge tonnage. The utilities give way to the futilities, the machinery of construction, is superseded by the devices of destruction, the country is impoverished by the exaction of excessive sacrifices.

Take as an illustration the colossal waterway that we have undertaken to construct across the Isthmus of Panama, at a cost of something less than $400,000,000. It is computed that the annual interest and other charges on this work, including the cost of the large garrisons that will be maintained at Panama, will be about $35,000,000. The annual revenue will be about $1,000,000 for quite a while to come. This is losing money at a great rate. The Panama Canal from an economic standpoint, was originally indefensible. As a commercial, dividend-returning proposition, it is hopeless. Yet this country freely, cheerfully, voluntarily, assumed the obligation to construct "the big ditch," without a thought of the ultimate cost. To-day this project is justified as a war measure, as a part of the national defense. Should war arise, say with Morocco, or Persia, or Arabia, the Pacific fleet can be transferred to the Atlantic by way of this canal. Should Cochin China, or Borneo, or Kamschatka assail us, the Atlantic fleet can be rushed to the Pacific by the same waterway. This facility of transfer, is supposed to justify our investment.

Should the friends of good roads propose to spend $400,000,000 on domestic improvements, upon highways that our children, and our children's children to the remotest generation will use, as the men of to-day are using the roads that Rome built when she sent her legions to the four corners of the earth, the advocates of military expenditures, and of elaborate schemes of national defense against chimerical antagonists, would protest in the name of economy against this expenditure, and appeal to the country to reject a scheme involving so extravagant an application of public money.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have yielded freely heretofore to interruptions, but I have little time remaining. Will the gentleman supply me with additional time, if I yield? If I had the time, I would gladly yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, in a nutshell, this is what our bill will accomplish. It will aid every community between the two oceans, that is interested in the betterment of its highways. Under its stimulating effect an era of universal road improvement will be happily inaugurated. The States that have done well, will do better. The States that are laggard, will take heart. Provision is made for every class of road.

The basic principle of this measure is compensation by the Federal Government for the use of the roads traveled by the mail carriers in the star route and Rural Delivery Service.

The constitutional power of the Federal Government to construct, or promote works of internal improvement has been debated from the foundation of the Republic. Heretofore the question of Federal aid to the construction or maintenance of highways, has been considered from the point of view, either of appropriations in aid of the construction of such works as are authorized by the States, and are national in their character, or of appropriations for the direct construction of roads and canals in order to "facilitate, promote, and give security to internal commerce among the several States, and to render more easy and less expensive, the means and provisions for the common defense." The chief obstacle thus far in the path of appropriations in aid of road making, or of road maintenance within the several States, has been the indisposition on the part of the States to agree to any measure of Federal control or authority over their roads. No practicable scheme of joint operations using in part Federal, and in other part State money has been, or is likely to be devised. One sole and responsible agency, whether State or Federal, must do the work, and all the funds appropriated for this work, whether county, state, or national, should be turned over to this agency. This is what this bill proposes to do with respect to Federal payments in compensation for use of the state roads.

It is believed that this measure would have been received with favor by even so strenuous an advocate of the rights of the States as President Monroe who vetoed a bill for repairs on the Cumberland Pike, but announced that he favored appropriations for the maintenance of roads, to be exclusively expended by the States.

The specter of Federal interference with state or local affairs, has been eliminated by the form in which payments will be made. The public is familiar with the system in vogue of compensating the railroads for the transportation of mail matter, and of Government agents and agencies connected with the mail service. The aggregate of these payments in the last fiscal year amounted to about $51,000,000. Thousands of miles of exclusively state roads are traveled by rural and star route carriers. At present these roads are maintained by the States, though the Federal Government enjoys their free and uninterrupted use for its mail service, whether by rural, or star route carriers. No reason is perceived why the Government should not pay for this use of these highways, the amount of the payment to be determined in any given instance by the character of the road traversed by Federal employees performing Federal service. For the purpose of this determination the bill divides the roads in use, or to be used for this service, into three classes.

Class A is the highest form of improved road in country use. For a road of this character, used in the rural-delivery and star-route service, it is provided that the Government shall pay at the rate of $25 per mile per year.

Class B is the next form of improved road defined in the bill, a road of high quality but not so good as that defined in class A. For this road the compensation fixed is at the rate of $20 per mile per year.

Class C comprehends the ordinary dirt roads of the country, and for these roads the prescribed compensation is at the rate of $15 per mile per year.

Payments are to be made at the end of each year to the appropriate custodian of the road funds, on the warrant of the Postmaster General. No payment will be made for a road not falling within one of the prescribed classes, and as the determination of the proper character of the road used, will be at all times in the hands of the agents of the Federal Government, the interests of the Government in this respect will be adequately conserved. If the road is not maintained to the prescribed standard, the road authorities will not be entitled to receive compensation. If it is maintained to the standard for a portion of the year, then the compensation will be paid pro rata. The most zealous and tenacious advocate of the rights of the States will be unable to find in this bill any encroachment upon those rights.

The States will maintain and control their highways, and the Federal Government will pay for using them, provided that they are adequately maintained in the prescribed condition. If the maintenance of state roads is a function of the States, that function will not be trenched upon, or in anywise impaired by this bill. The States will continue to exercise the sole and exclusive control of state highways, and will be under no compulsion to receive the payments contemplated for their use. It is hardly necessary to enlarge upon the benefits to the whole public that will follow upon the general improvement of the highways in the several States. In the matter of good roads, this country lags behind the older countries of the civilized world. In part this is due to the fact that this country is the only one of the great powers, that makes no national contribution either to the construction, or to the maintenance of public roads. For this our dual system of government is largely responsible, since this duality has made it difficult to afford this aid in such a manner as to reconcile the conflicting rights and interests of the States, and of the Nation.

It is believed that the measure proposed is not only no infraction of the Constitution but is in harmony with its general purpose. The number of miles of State roads now traveled by the rural and star-route carriers is approximately 1,179,000. The mileage in class A is 35,000 miles, in class B, 83,000 miles, and in class C, 1,061,000 miles. According to the prescribed scheme of payments the amount per year that this bill will carry on the above basis, should payments be made for the entire mileage, will be $18,450,000. But it must be borne in mind that only a small proportion of this aggregate mileage is in condition to receive immediate compensation.

The figures given show that the present mileage of hard roads in the United States is comparatively small, but each year shows a healthy increase in this direction.

The truth of the declaration of Charles Sumner, made over 50 years ago, that "The two greatest forces for the advancement of civilization, are the schoolmaster, and good roads," is emphasized by the experience of the intervening years, and points to the wisdom of a union of educational forces for aggressive action for permanent roads.

The improved roads, totaling 118,000 miles, may be considered as practically conforming to the requirements of the bill, and entitled to receive compensation, but the aggregate payments on this account will be only $2,535,000 per year. A very large proportion of the mileage of dirt roads will require much work at the hands of the local authorities before any claim for compensation can be presented. Hence it is believed that for the first year the payments under this bill will be comparatively small, the exact amount required being impossible of estimate. In proportion as the mileage of the rural and star routes increases, and dirt roads are improved so as to fall within class A, class B, or class C, the payments under this amendment will increase, but this increase will be a legitimate and natural evolution. The inevitable effect of this measure will be not only an immediate improvement of the roads of all the States, but a stimulus to road construction in every community.

The tendency of road building hereafter will be in the direction of a steadily progressive change in the character of the state roads, the dirt roads being transformed into hard roads as rapidly as possible, so as to entitle the local communities to receive the larger tolls contemplated for roads of the latter description. The universality of benefit of this measure is one of its striking features of merit. It will stimulate road construction and road improvement in every State, and practically in every community. Wherever a rural or a star route runs, however remote that route may be from the great centers of trade and commerce, the beneficent influence of this bill upon road improvement will be proportionately felt. So far from stifling or impeding the spirit of local improvement and local development, this measure of Federal compensation for roads actually used, will energize that spirit, since the payments provided will swell the local contributions into a generous working total. On the whole, it is submitted that the bill is meritorious in its purpose, and constitutional in its character.

The pending proposition is a comprehensive scheme having reference at once to present conditions and future development The ultimate road, is a highly improved hard road, macadam or its equivalent. The present roads are largely dirt, or soil roads. Some gentlemen seem to favor appropriations for magnificent boulevards, few in number, but things of beauty, and joys forever to the automobilist. The advocates of such roads deride the plan of aiding the States to maintain and improve the ordinary roads of the country. Appropriations to this end are denounced as a waste of public money, because it is an annually recurring charge. Apparently the Members who oppose appropriations for the maintenance of dirt roads, are unaware that improved roads carry a high conservation charge to maintain their efficiency. A continual reparation is in progress upon the streets of Washington, calling for a heavy annual appropriation. Why is it considered to be good administration to keep improved highways in order through an annual expenditure, and a waste of public money to maintain in proper condition the dirt roads over which 90 per cent of our people travel? The conservation, or maintenance of roads, whether of dirt, or of any other material, must be the keynote of any scheme of intelligent improvement. Adequately maintained the dirt road is the finest road in the world for nine months in the year. It is also the easiest road to maintain during that period. Why should a well considered effort to improve the roads of that class, as a part of an entire scheme which includes the highest forms of improved roads, be derisively designated as "dirt roads statesmanship" and opposed on the ground that the improvement will not be permanent, and the necessity for appropriations will annually recur? I for one, welcome the appellation. It is to our credit that although Congress passed a resolution in 1818 that it had the power under the Constitution to appropriate money for the construction of post roads, and still later Daniel Webster declared that he had reached the conclusion that the Government had the power to accomplish sundry objects, or aid in their accomplishment, commonly called works of internal improvement, it was reserved for the year 1912 to see these declarations take practical form, and dirt roads come into their own as a proper subject of government aid, so that they may be maintained in that form which will afford the most serviceable use.

This bill marks a new departure in our national policy, but one easily defended, and likely to grow in popular favor. It will be known by its fruits, and justified by the universal diffusion of its benefits. I rejoice in the fact that this great measure of popular relief, so rich in its promise of domestic development, will be enacted by a Democratic House. This is the day, I long have sought. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is for the bill that is made in order now?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Absolutely, and unequivocally. I can not make my declaration of faith any stronger.

Mr. CANNON. I was in doubt as to the tenor of the gentleman's remarks. I was not present when he began.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Have my remarks been of an uncertain character?

Mr. CANNON. I was not present, I will say to the gentleman during the course of his remarks. I have just come in.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, there is no measure that we have enacted, or are likely to enact, that holds out so much of hope, so much of encouragement, so fair a promise of prosperity, as the pending bill, which I doubt not will be passed by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I quite agree, among other things, with the last statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY], that the blessings of government should be equally distributed among the people. The burdens of government must be borne equally under the system of taxation by the people, each individual paying taxes on what he consumes and not on what he owns.

When the rural mail service was first adopted it was adopted under a bill introduced by Mr. Watson, of Georgia. William L. Wilson, of West Virginia, was the Postmaster General, and he established two rural routes in West Virginia, and shortly after that two in Pennsylvania. From that beginning the rural route system has developed into its present magnificent proportions.

I am referring to this in order that I may call the attention of the House to the condition of the rural mail service throughout the United States in connection with these propositions which are now being considered in this bill.

In round numbers, within the last two years about 2,000 rural routes have been approved by the inspectors of the Post Office Department. Over 25 routes have been approved in my own district, besides others that ought to have been approved that were not approved. These rural mail routes are demanded by the people who to-day have practically no mail service.

When the economic program first struck the Post Office Department they abolished in my district a number of star routes, with the idea that they would be replaced by the rural system. These rural routes have not been established. I have gone to the Post Office Department repeatedly and made an effort to get that mail service established which the people of my district were entitled to. I have been put off with promises from day to day. Some of my Republican friends have been good enough to go down and interview the Post Office Department for me. I do not know who is to blame. I am treated with absolute courtesy by the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, who now has charge of this service, but I want the people of my district to understand that not only have Democratic districts been unable to get this service, but numbers of Republican Congressmen have told me that the development of the rural mail service had been stopped entirely in their own districts. It is only fair that the people should know the facts. The Postmaster General had a magnificent opportunity to make for himself a great record in the establishment of good mail service throughout the country. He had behind him the unanimous sentiment of an overwhelming Congress. That Congress, irrespective of party, had overwhelmingly voted to him, in addition to the $550,000 which he endeavored to turn back into the Treasury, $1,250,000 to extend the rural mail service throughout the country.

Instead of heeding this demand of Congress and of the people he has neglected the farmer and those living in the country, and under the guise of economy has refused them the only service which the Government performs for the country people.

What an opportunity the present Postmaster General had and how he has neglected it! He could have endeared himself to the great farming class by building up our Rural Mail Service, but he evidently does not care for their good will nor for their approval.

The report which comes from Republican and Democratic Congressmen is that the Rural Mail Service has been paralyzed throughout the United States. If the Postmaster General had measured up to the full standard of a Postmaster General he could have made for this administration a magnificent record by giving to every farmer in this great country of ours his mail at least once a day. I take absolutely no stock in that theory of government that the Post Office Department should be self-sustaining. On the contrary, it is the only department of Government where that principle is invoked. We spend $136,000,000 a year on the Navy without getting one single penny in return. We spend $100,000,000 on the Army, and we do not get a penny in return. These men who live in the rural districts are the men who with their brawn and sinew must sustain this Government, must sustain this great Republic in all its endeavors, because they are the beginning, the source, of practically all the wealth there is in the country.

The Commissioner of Education says that 65 per cent of the children of the United States live in the country and not in the towns, cities, and villages. In the great State of Massachusetts, which is overburdened with great cities, there are 106 adults over school age to every 55 children, while in South Carolina the reverse is true. In Mississippi, which is an agricultural State, the reverse is true. Therefore I say to this House that the hope of this Republic depends entirely upon the conditions of country life and how we develop and educate the country boy and the country girl. [Applause.]

Mr. LANGLEY. I have been a personal friend of the present Postmaster General for nearly 20 years, but the sentiment that I feel for him on that account does not prompt me in questioning the gentleman's statements about what he has found. I should like to know where the gentleman gets the information, or upon what he bases the statement that as a result of the present administration of that department the Rural Mail Service all over the country has been paralyzed. My information is that he has done more to benefit that service than any of his predecessors, and I think the records of the department will so show.

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman from Kentucky will take the trouble to go down and investigate the records of that department, and if he will go and ask the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, who, I presume, will talk to him as freely as he does to me, he will find that the Rural Mail Service in many sections of this country is in a deplorable condition and has been in that condition for a number of years.

My time is limited. I had intended to tell the House the condition that prevails in my district with reference to numbers of communities. Without going into details, I will state that in one county in my district it takes five days to get a letter from one portion of the county to the county seat, and it takes four days to get an answer back. A man living within 6 miles of the courthouse, in Calhoun County, can not write to the courthouse and get an answer in less than 8 or 10 days to save his life.

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not contend that the present system is perfect, and certainly the gentleman will not contend that it can be made perfect in a good many years to come, but what I do say is that the records of the Post Office Department will show that under the administration of the present Postmaster General more has been done for that service than under any of his predecessors.

Mr. SISSON. I can not yield any further.

I want to say in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, and finally, that the gentleman must be aware of the fact that a little over two years ago an Executive order came down for economy, and that the Postmaster General sent down his demand for economy, and the excuse for not establishing the rural routes was because they were consolidating the rural routes and the star-route service under the Fourth Assistant. The gentleman does not contend that for 12 months any rural routes were established in that department. Until that order went forth I had no trouble in getting rural service established where the people had a right to it. Prior to that time that department always responded when the investigation of the inspector showed that the people were entitled to that service. Since that time I have not been able to get a single rural route, and I have made pig-paths from my office to the Post Office Department. I have received nothing except courteous treatment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want hurriedly to advert to some matters in relation to the bill now under consideration.

Three propositions—rural mail, good roads, and parcel post—mean a great deal to the country. If the Rural Mail Service is developed as it should be developed, so as to give every farmer within the United States his mail at least once a day, it will simply give him what he is entitled to. He contributes his pro rata share to the expenses of the rest of the Government. He contributes to maintain the Army and the Navy. He contributes his labor and his toil to produce that which feeds the great cities. He is compelled to pay tribute to all manufacturers under our present system, notwithstanding in many instances we have to-day overdeveloped our manufacturing enterprises. The Government has lent its aid to building up manufacturing industries of the country until the cry is now going up, "What shall we do to prevent the rural districts being depleted?"

First give them a good mail service, so that every family at least once a day may come in contact with the great and mighty world outside their limited sphere. In the great cities you have libraries, night schools, and all the advantages and aids to education, but in the country they are, as it were, secluded, and unless they can get their newspapers, unless they can get in touch and contact with the world, the boys of the country are vastly at a disadvantage as compared with the boys in the cities. If you want to develop your country life give the farmer a good mail service. If you give a community a good mail service it may not for the time being pay its expenses, but when you shall have developed a perfect mail service it will increase land values, it will increase the desire of the people to live close to the community that has the mail service, and that portion of the community will develop more rapidly than that without mail service. This is the age of rapid transportation and quick information, and the man in the country needs it and wants it just as bad as any living in the cities. This Government certainly ought to give the farmer who does so much for the Government his mail at least once a day. Then, if you will give to the people on the mail routes a good public road, if you will give them a road so that they may go to school, to church, and to market, and thus cheapen transportation in the country, you will be performing a great service. The good-roads department of the Government says that the heaviest tax we pay to-day is the tax on bad country roads. It costs us more and increases the cost of living more than anything else. But if you will develop the good country roads and let the farmer have good roads upon which to go to market——

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Flood of Virginia). Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Why do you not develop them?

Mr. SISSON. We are doing our very best. The gentleman, of course, is opposed to any Federal aid to good roads and unwilling to lend any sort of encouragement to the movement, notwithstanding his party's platform declares for this encouragement. He would put this Government back to the stone age. The Federal Government can not fail to perform its duty by the good-roads movement. I want to say that, so far as I am individually concerned, I believe it would be cheaper if these States would develop their roads in and of themselves and by a direct system of taxation. But before the development of the railroads in this country the fathers of this Republic had turned their attention to the building of great roads in the United States, and they took their hands from this method of development solely because the railroad was being developed and was a more rapid means of transportation; but the time has come now when the Federal Government must do its duty by good roads.

Both of the great political parties declared themselves in favor of the development of good roads. Whatever doubts I may have had, so far as I am concerned, in reference to the Government embarking in this new field of activity, is settled by the Democratic platform. The last Democratic platform is unequivocal, plain, and free from doubt and is in the following language:

> We favor Federal aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Did either party declare itself in favor of paying $25 a mile a year for the use of the road for old Dobbin and a one-horse cart?

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman knows that no platform ever goes into detail, but it is left for the wisdom of Congress to determine how to give the aid. A one-horse-cart man is entitled to a good road just as much as the automobile man.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Did the platform provide for the paying of tolls for the use of those roads?

Mr. SISSON. It does not matter how the aid comes. It is immaterial to me and it is immaterial to the people who are building the roads. The thing is to get the aid [applause], and if the Government of the United States should fail to give the aid, then we violate the platform.

In reference to the parcel-post system, I want to state that there are a great many bills now before Congress. I am in favor of a general parcel post, but I want a parcel-post system that will require the man using the parcel post to pay the expense of hauling each package and let each package bear its own burden. [Applause.] I am not in favor, nor can I subscribe to the doctrine that it costs no more to run a train from New York to San Francisco than it does from New York to Jersey City. I do not subscribe to the doctrine that the car has to go, and since it has to go you may put a flat rate on and haul the package from Chicago to San Francisco. Such a principle is wrong, because you must fix the rate, unless the Government loses on the business, high enough so that at an intermediate point between two points the charge for hauling the package will be exactly what it ought to be. Then for every mile you get nearer the initial point the man who pays the same flat rate is paying too much, and when you get beyond that point the man at a greater distance is paying too little. I am unwilling to mulct the people on one end of the long haul for the benefit of the people on the other. If it is too little to pay the expense, then you must mulct all the taxpayers to pay the expense of hauling a piece of merchandise for another. Whether or not the United States Government ought ever to have gone into the parcel-post business is not now a question for us to discuss, because we are hauling 4-pound packages and we are hauling 11-pound packages by treaty, and the Government is now in that business.

Since we are in the business, it is up to this Congress to devise some scheme to make the parcel-post system, since we have determined to go into it, the best parcel-post system in the world; to make it the model for all the people of the earth. It is our duty to make such a model system that it will be a credit to our Government and a benefit to all the people. Let us make it the best parcel-post system that can be conceived. I do not want Congress to rush hastily into the matter. Hasty legislation will mean that you will be years in patching it up. We need a well-conceived and a well-defined plan under which we can operate during the next few years, so as to get a system that will cheapen transportation to the people.

A great many people have demanded the Sulzer bill. This bill is not as good as other bills before Congress. This bill is not what the people really desire. It will not give the relief sought. I will call attention briefly to one or two objections to that bill. I can not take it up a clause at a time, for I have not the time. It has the fatal defect of having in it the flat rate. If under the Sulzer bill, which limits the parcel to 11 pounds, the farmer can find anything that he can ship, except queen bees, dried fruits, and dried plants, then I would like to have some gentleman show it to me, because under the present law with fourth-class matter, which is the limit in the Sulzer bill, the farmer can ship over the rural route nothing except "dried fruits, dried plants, and queen bees, when properly packed." If we had a parcel-post system, the man living in the city and buying from the farmer should have the same right to have his market for the farmer's produce, which is hauled to him in small packages, that the manufacturer or the wholesale merchant or the department store has to reach their customer going the other way. Therefore our farmers have evidently not carefully considered the Sulzer bill. I have talked to hundreds of farmers in my district, and talked to them on the stump, and my position is known on this question. I will not give my people a serpent when they ask for a fish, nor will I give them a stone when they ask for bread. I want to give them a real parcel post.

Anyone who will give the Sulzer bill some study will find that it is not what the farmer wants, and it is not fair to the small merchant and the small town or city. I am unwilling to vote for the Sulzer bill in its present form because there are two bills now pending which are so much better.

I think the solution of this whole question lies in the idea advanced by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS]. The Federal Government can not afford to go into competition with private individuals or with corporations engaged in business. If the Federal Government shall succeed with an 11-pound package, it will find that it will be compelled to take a monopoly to the amount of 11 pounds. Then you will have deprived the express company of the right to haul packages below the 11-pound weight, and you leave them a radius in which to transact business only as between 11 pounds and the 100-pound proposition. We all know that the people will not be satisfied with an 11-pound package.

The business of this country has taught that the division which the railroads make with the express company is that the express company shall have a monopoly up to 100 pounds. Now, if the Federal Government shall embark in this business they should take that monopoly over entirely. We had an experience with the mail service, and the United States Government was rendered ridiculous in its efforts to carry mail in competition with private individuals. Without going into the history of all that legislation, Congress in 1842 passed a statute, which is practically the statute now, making it a violation of law for any individual, partnership, or corporation to carry for hire any matter which was mailable under the law at that time. The result was that everybody carrying mail was compelled to go out of the mail-carrying business, and from that day on the mail system of the United States got to be the model for the world. Now, we need not repeat the mistakes of the past. We ought not to get into the same condition that we got our mail service in, or that portion of it for the carrying of parcels, when we undertook to carry letters, because the private individual would reduce the charge in every line and naturally endeavor to make the postal service ridiculous. But the Government had time enough to get sufficient equipment and to supply the people with their mail. They passed the statute of 1842, which took over the monopoly, or directed as the Postmaster General thought wise at that time, until they finally got a practical monopoly of all the mail business. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] here two or three years ago on the Post Office bill caused me to investigate this matter when he was advocating the Federal Government asserting its monopoly in reference to magazines and all fourth-class matter, and that caused an investigation of the history of that trouble, and just so certain as we pass a parcel-post bill limited to 11 pounds, or anything from that to 100 pounds, you are going to have the express company on one side endeavoring to throw every impediment in the way of its success, whereas if you assert a monopoly and say to the express company that just as the Postmaster General can find equipment and as fast as Congress is willing to furnish it to him that the Government will take over the carrying of all packages to the amount of 100 pounds. It will succeed, and it will not succeed until that time comes. I have been frank with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS]. I am opposed to that feature of his bill which would undertake to condemn at one fell swoop all the express companies, because that would involve us in perhaps a great deal of litigation. Not only that, but it is not necessary that we shall assume that burden, because if we assert a monopoly, the express companies, realizing that as soon as the Federal Government is ready to do the business they will be put out of business, will voluntarily enter into negotiations with the Post Office Department and endeavor to get from them the best price they can for just such equipment as the Post Office Department sees that it needs of the present equipment of the express companies. And it is useless for men to say that you are going to limit this proposition to 11 pounds. It will never be limited to 11 pounds——

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. If the Goeke bill were amended to exclude the condemnation provision, the abolition of the express companies and substituting the Government in their place and giving the Government the power to purchase this equipment if it could agree on a price, otherwise secure the equipment elsewhere, the gentleman would be entirely in favor of my proposition?

Mr. SISSON. I think it is the best proposition that has been presented to this House. I think it is the only proposition that goes down to the crux of the whole matter. Now, as to whether or not all the details have been worked out I am unable to say. It is a great, big question, and the more you study it the more angles it has to it, but that does not warrant us to mince matters and give the people just as little relief as possible. The people are suffering from extortionate express rates, and the Federal Government either will not or can not regulate the express rates, and the people of our cities as well as the people of the country demand this legislation. The Republicans of this House as well as the Democrats are anxiously endeavoring to solve this question, are anxiously endeavoring to reach a correct solution that will give the people the best possible service.

Mr. LEVER. The opposition to the Goeke bill at present is because of its feature of condemnation and purchase of the express companies?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is willing to take them over and let the Government assert its monopoly in the small packages?

Mr. SISSON. Assert a monoply up to 100 pounds, if we desire to do so.

Mr. LEVER. I understand.

Mr. SISSON. And then, after the Government has gotten the equipment on, we will say, the Pennsylvania Railroad, or the Southern Railway, or the Illinois Central Railroad, let the Postmaster General give notice to the express companies that the Government on a certain date will assert its monopoly of the business on that line. By this method you take over the carrying of parcels of 100 pounds or less gradually without interfering in any way with the business of the country.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON]?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. JACKSON. I want to say, first, that I agree most heartily with all the gentleman has said except this one slight thing. Has the gentleman fairly considered whether we might be able to maintain a Government express along the lines of the Lewis bill without the Government monopoly, since we have the advantage of the rural route, if we should connect them up with the system, and the additional advantage of the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce regulations and adjust rates?

Mr. SISSON. That, of course, would be a mere experiment. I could not answer the gentleman's question. But here is my fundamental objection to that, that I do not want the Federal Government or the State governments to go into competition with private individuals in the transaction of any business.

The Government ought to assert a monopoly of a business or it ought to stay out of the business. The private individual can not compete with the Federal Government, which has the power to use drastic means and measures and to pass penal laws when it sees fit and destroy a man's business.

Mr. JACKSON. Does not the gentleman think that more or less a sentimental reason? We are in competition in the banking business with private enterprises, and with the express companies now in the transmission by registered packages of valuable packages from one part of the country to the other. The Government has not seriously suffered nor has any individual seriously suffered.

Mr. SISSON. But the Government has not gone seriously into the business of hauling packages. It has not gone, so far as the Government itself is concerned, into the banking business.

Mr. JACKSON. I refer to the savings bank law.

Mr. SISSON. I do not think that the savings-bank proposition, which passed this House since I have been a Member, is a savings bank at all. I do not think it can measure up to any functions of a savings bank. It simply permits under that law citizens to deposit money with the post office and draw a certain rate of interest on that.

Mr. JACKSON. It has done a good deal of good and not any particular harm.

Mr. SISSON. I think it has done very little good and I hope but little harm.

Mr. JACKSON. I am simply reciting an example as to what we have in some two or three particulars now and perhaps others, in which the Government and the States are in competition with private individuals, and no particular harm results from it. This is mentioned on the question whether we can do—can maintain a postal express without Government monopoly.

Mr. SISSON. I fear this result would happen; that either the express company would be driven out of the business or the Government would be. I understand that is one of the business institutions that is very much inveighed against. I am unwilling that the Government should exercise the power, because a man has done wrong in business, to take his property and confiscate it, either by asserting a monopoly or confiscating his property.

Mr. JACKSON. It is a little off the subject, perhaps, but does not the gentleman believe that the whole express scheme, and especially these contracts here that have been discussed during the debate, are in direct violation of the Sherman law?

Mr. SISSON. I am not so familiar with these contracts as to know whether they are in violation of that statute or not. But I do know that contracts exist between the express companies and the railroad companies, who have a very intimate relation with each other in stock as well as in management.

Mr. JACKSON. The provision of the contract which limits the express company to 150 per cent of the freight rate would unquestionably be in restraint of trade?

Mr. SISSON. Unquestionably.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I desire to say that if this Government shall perform its duty to the people who bear the burdens of the Government it must stop its riotous extravagance in useless employees and high salaries, in Army and Navy expenses, and in exorbitant pension steals and frauds, and spend the money where the taxpayer will get some real benefit. Spend it upon perfecting our rural mail system and upon our roads. Millions of money is squandered each year upon schemes which do not benefit the people in the least. Our people are tired of it, and are now demanding in earnest that they be given some little consideration. Our officeholders here in Washington are building luxurious quarters in which to lounge and find their ease, all out of the people's money, and claim that it is to beautify "our Capital City." How many crimes are committed in the name of "beautiful Capital City."

Let this Democratic Congress stand firm by the principles of our party, and cut out every species of graft and extravagance. Let us spend the people's money in their benefit and not for the benefit of the few. We can with courage go to the country for the great trinity—good rural mail service, good roads, and cheap transportation.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I am sorry I can not yield to the gentleman. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, my colleague [Mr. MCKELLAR], 25 minutes.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, the subject of national aid to roads has been one that has occupied the attention of Congress from time to time since the organization of our Government. As we all know, the Federal Constitution itself provides that Congress shall have the power "to establish post offices and post roads." Under this authority the Post Office Department of the Government was established, and shortly afterwards, and as early as 1806, Congress gave aid to road building. In 1818 it passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That Congress has the power under the Constitution to appropriate money for the construction of post roads and other roads, and of canals, and for the improvement of waterways.

It is now frequently claimed by those who are opposed to Federal aid to road building that it is not a subject of Federal jurisdiction. However, in view of this direct authority in the Constitution, and its direct exercise by the early founders of the Republic; it certainly can not now be argued that the Federal Government has not the power to build or aid in the building of roads in this country. Mr. Jefferson believed that the Federal Government had the power to build roads and so declared himself. Shortly afterwards we find Mr. Webster, Mr. Clay, and Mr. Calhoun, the great statesmen of our early history, were all of the same opinion. Mr. Calhoun, who was probably the staunchest advocate of State rights that this country has ever known, was not only a firm believer in the power of Federal Government to construct good roads, but in 1817 he introduced a bill in this House to provide a permanent fund for the construction of good roads. Two years later, when he was Secretary of War, in a report he said:

No object of the kind is more important and there is none to which State and individual capacity is more inadequate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I can not refrain from calling the attention of the committee to a part of the argument of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. In his speech, as I read it, he says:

This measure is confidently expected to appeal strongly to the rural population and, it is hoped, will sustain the waning political fortunes of those from the country districts who favor it.

Perhaps if I were situated as some gentlemen are my judgment, like theirs, would be somewhat affected by the political exigencies of my situation; fortunately for me I can look at the matter uninfluenced by the importunings of the folks at home, who hope to benefit by this extraordinary and unique raid upon the Federal Treasury. * * * Down in the moonshining districts it would be highly popular to tax Uncle Sam for the use of the highways by the deputy marshals. [Laughter.] Out our way, if we are to inaugurate this policy, it would be a popular measure to tax the Government for the use of our highways by special agents of the Land Office. [Laughter.] In fact, I know of no other way in which we could secure our share of Federal loot. [Laughter.]

The gentleman who is, I believe, primarily responsible for this plan calls himself, I understand, a Jeffersonian Democrat. I wonder what the patron saint of Democracy would say to such a measure of centralization? Shadow of Thomas Jefferson, with his clear perception of the dividing line between the powers and responsibilities and jurisdiction, respectively, of the Federal Government and the sovereign States!

Mr. Chairman, I do not come from a country district, strictly speaking. The city which is in my district has as many or more people in it than the whole State represented by the gentleman from Wyoming, and so I feel that I am in an unbiased condition of mind in so far as country roads are concerned, for my advocacy of this bill is not because I want to get back to Congress, as the gentleman from Wyoming suggests, or because I come from a country district, as designated by him.

But I want to call the gentleman's attention to this fact—and that is that the main feature of his statement I take exception to—that he accuses those of us who are in favor of this bill of endeavoring to "loot" the Treasury. I want to say to him and to this House—and I regret that I do not see him on the floor at this moment—that the State which he represents has not a mile of improved roads in it except such as the United States Government has put there. He has over 10,000 miles of public roads in his State, not one mile of which is improved, except that in the Yellowstone National Park, which has been improved by the National Government. And yet he is opposed to Government roads. He is opposed to national aid to roads in that condition of his State's affairs, when the only improved road he has in his State has been put there by Federal "loot," as he calls it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. MCKELLAR. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. During the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] offered a number of amendments for the building of roads in Wyoming out of Indian funds, on Indian reservations.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I did not know that, but I judge that the gentleman from Wyoming, who is talking about "looting" now—I do not mean that in any improper sense—forgot about that for the time being.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. McKELLAR. With pleasure.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. In reference to that matter I will state that the gentleman from Wyoming offered his amendment to build roads across Indian reservations, on Indian lands. That proposition was very promptly voted down, as I hope the House will vote down this or any other proposition to build roads at the expense of the Federal Government. [Applause.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Now, the gentleman stated that all of us who support this bill are not conforming to the principles of Mr. Jefferson. I want to show what Mr. Jefferson said about it. Mr. Jefferson during the eight years that he was President of the United States signed many bills for the improvement of highways. Among other things which he said, I quote the following:

Their—

The people's—patriotism would certainly prefer its—

The then present revenues of the Government—continuance and application to the great purposes of public education, roads, rivers, canals, and such other objects of public improvement as it may be thought proper to add to the constitutional enumerations of Federal powers. By these operations new channels of communication will be opened between the States, the lines of separation will disappear, their interests will be identified, and their union cemented by new and indissoluble ties. (Jefferson, Messages, Dec. 2, 1806, Vol. I, p. 409.)

And again, Mr. Jefferson said:

Or, shall it—

not rather be appropriated to the improvements of roads, canals, rivers, education, and other great foundations of prosperity and union under powers which Congress may already possess, or such amendment of the Constitution as may be approved by the States. (Jefferson, Messages, Nov. 8, 1808, Vol. I, p. 456.)

I agree with my friend from Wyoming that Mr. Jefferson had a "clear perception of the dividing line between the powers and responsibilities and jurisdiction, respectively, of the Federal Government and the sovereign States,"—the only difference between us being that Mr. Jefferson favored my side of the argument and not that of my distinguished friend.

Speaking of "looting" the Treasury, however—and in this I again do not agree with my friend, that a good-roads bill is a proposed "looting" of the Treasury, for I think that it is the highest form that Federal aid to the welfare of this Nation can take—but looking at it as "loot," as my friend calls it, I wonder whether he thinks that this is a preferable form of "loot" to the erection of a $75,000 building at Sundance, in his own State, in a community numbering 281 souls all told?

I want to say further to the committee that, while it is true that Mr. Jefferson at times doubted whether Congress had the power under the Constitution to inaugurate a system of internal improvements, still he always signed good-roads bills, and while Mr. Monroe opposed a particular act creating a road within the boundaries of a particular State and vetoed it, yet it is also true that he signed many such good-roads bills, notably the Cumberland Pike act.

Mr. Washington, time and again, referred in his messages to the power and the duty to build roads, recommending them in the following: Messages, January 8, 1790, Volume I, page 66; December 8, 1790, Volume I, page 83; October 25, 1791, Volume I, page 107.

Mr. Jefferson took a similar stand, although a less emphatic one.

Mr. Monroe and Mr. Adams were in favor of the same manner of dealing with this question, and Mr. Jackson was the only one who refused to sign such bills, believing that under the Constitution he had not the right to do so, although he was a most ardent advocate of all kinds of internal improvements. I call to the attention of the committee the following from messages of Mr. Madison and Mr. Adams:

Among the means of advancing the public interest the occasion is a proper one for recalling the attention of Congress to the great importance of establishing throughout our country the roads and canals which can best be executed under the national authority. No objects within the circle of political economy so richly repay the expense bestowed on them; there are none, the utility of which is more universally ascertained and acknowledged; none that do more honor to the governments whose wise and enlarged patriotism duly appreciates them. Nor is there any country which presents a field where nature invites more the art of man to complete her own work for his accommodation and benefit. These considerations are strengthened, moreover, by the political effect of these facilities for intercommunication in bringing and binding more closely together the various parts of an extended confederation. Whilst the States individually, with a laudable enterprise and emulation, avail themselves of their local advantages by new roads, by navigable canals, and by improving the streams susceptible of navigation, the General Government is the more urged to similar undertakings, requiring a national jurisdiction and national means by the prospect of thus systematically completing so estimable a work. (Madison, Messages, Dec. 15, 1815, Vol. I, p. 56.)

Mr. Monroe, on April 30, 1824, approved the act to appropriate $30,000 for the purpose of causing to be made the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates of the routes of such roads and canals as the President of the United States might deem of national importance in the commercial or military point of view or necessary for the transportation of the public mail. (Adams, Messages, 1825, Vol. II, p. 360.)

And the United States Supreme Court has held that the building of roads is within the terms of the Constitution. (See authority hereafter cited.) So that my friend is wrong in indicating that the position of the Democratic Party has in any way become different on this matter of the improvement of the roads of the country or that such Federal improvement is not a Democratic doctrine.

I wish now to call the attention of the committee to the argument of Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I took an automobile trip through the State of my friend [Mr. MOORE] this last summer, and after taking that trip I am astonished beyond measure to find him taking such an attitude. If there ever was a State which needs good roads it is Pennsylvania, which in 1899 had more than 87,000 miles of roads, and only about 3 per cent of those roads were improved roads. I can not understand how the representative of a State that has so few improved roads can be opposed to a bill like this, that must of necessity increase the number of improved roads in that State.

And yet we find the representative of that great State here raising his voice against Federal aid to roads in his State.

The last report that we have of the condition of public roads shows that in 1909 there were about 2,190,000 miles of public roads in the United States, and of this large mileage only about 190,000 miles have been improved, leaving more than 2,000,000 miles unimproved; and there is this small percentage of improved roads in this country, notwithstanding the fact that every State and county government in the Nation is now appropriating money to the cause of good roads. Mr. Calhoun was exactly right when he said that the State and individual capacity was inadequate to the task of furnishing good roads for this Nation; and when he said that "it must be perfected by the General Government or not perfected at all" his prophecy as to the situation was absolutely accurate. Indeed, nothing can be more certain than is the fact that the roads of this country can only be made commensurate with the needs of the country except by the aid of the National Government.

I want to say to my State rights friends that I believe in the doctrine of State rights myself. Mr. Calhoun's idea was this, that individual communities like counties or even States or improvement districts were not able and never would be able to give a perfected system of roads in this country; and the correctness of Mr. Calhoun's idea is shown by the fact that after over 125 years of existence, when there are over 2,190,000 miles of roads in this country, only 190,000 miles have been improved.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Has the gentleman any opinion or any principle or any view with reference to State rights that he would not surrender in a minute when an appropriation for his district or State is in sight?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the gentleman that down in Tennessee where I come from we do not know so much about Government appropriations as do some other parts of our Union. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Virtually the only connection between the district that I represent and the National Government to-day is the distribution of a few garden seeds and an exalted patriotism. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. BOWMAN. In behalf of the State of Pennsylvania I wish to say that in 1909 there were 3.84 per cent of her roads that were improved.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. And nearly 3,000 miles of that was either brick or macadam, and $50,000,000 has just been appropriated for new roads. There are many Members from the State of Pennsylvania who are wholly in favor of this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am delighted to hear it.

Mr. BOWMAN. One word more.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. It was stated here that it would cost the Government the first year about $16,000,000. Does not the gentleman believe that would be a wise expenditure in order to secure over 800,000 miles of road of the kind described in this bill? The last report of the Department of Agriculture upon roads shows less than 200,000 miles in the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am for any kind of proposition that means better road building; and if the gentleman will listen to what I have to say about it I think he will agree with me that it will mean an immense saving to the American people in the handling of their goods.

Mr. BOWMAN. I will agree, both before and after, with anything the gentleman may say in that direction.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not going into the history of road building. We know that in the early period of our national existence there was a great deal of discussion in Congress in reference to good roads. Mr. Clay, Mr. Calhoun, and Mr. Webster, the three great statesmen of the early period of our history, were all in favor of national aid to roads. That condition continued down until about the year 1835, when railroads came into vogue, and thereupon interest in public roads began to subside, and Congress was besieged by the representatives of the great railroads of the country to come forward and help them build railroads, and it did so. These gentlemen who are talking about it being an invasion of State rights for the Government to help upbuild the country by building public post roads, what have they been doing in reference to aiding the railroad building in this country? We know that they have done it, and I do not mean to say that it is not right, because we know that railroads help upbuild the country too; but for all that they do not upbuild the country to a much greater extent than the building of dirt roads.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will permit, the contention has been made that this bill is an invasion of State rights. I understand the gentleman is a very strong lawyer, and I should like to hear him discuss that proposition for a moment.

Mr. McKELLAR. All I can say about the invasion of State rights is that all of our earlier Presidents except Mr. Jackson gave their sanction, directly or indirectly, to national aid to building roads in this country. Mr. Washington was in favor of it. Nothing is recorded of the utterances of the first Mr. Adams on the subject. Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, Mr. Monroe, and Mr. John Quincy Adams all favored national aid to roads. John Quincy Adams advocating it in a very strong paper. Gen. Jackson was personally heartily in favor of it, but vetoed it because he thought it was unconstitutional, and recommended a constitutional amendment. So all the Presidents in the early part of our history were in favor of it. And I want to say to the gentleman that the Supreme Court of the United States has upheld national aid to roads in this country under the provisions of the Constitution that I have read. How anything could be plainer than that I do not know. When the early fathers of the Republic were in favor of it, believed in it, provided for it, and when the Supreme Court of our country has indorsed it, that ought to settle the legal question.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman understands that I am a member of the subcommittee which reported this bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. But being a layman and not a lawyer, I desired to get the legal judgment of the gentleman as to the invasion of State rights. I think the gentleman is absolutely right in his proposition.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think there is any invasion of State rights at all, I will say to the gentleman.

In the celebrated Debs case, Mr. Justice Brewer laid down the rule as to the authority and power of the Federal Government as follows:

> First. What are the relations of the General Government to interstate commerce and the transportation of the mails? They are those of direct supervision, control, and management. While under the dual system which prevails with us the powers of government are distributed between the State and the Nation, and while the latter is properly styled a government of enumerated powers, yet within the limits of such enumeration it has all the attributes of sovereignty, and in the exercise of those enumerated powers acts directly upon the citizen, and not through the intermediate agency of the State.
> The Government of the Union, then, is emphatically and truly a government of the people. In form and in substance it emanates from them. Its powers are granted by them and are to be exercised directly on them and for their benefit.
> No trace is to be found in the Constitution of an intention to create a dependence of the Government of the Union on those of the States for the exception of the great powers assigned to it. Its means are adequate to its ends, and on those means alone was it expected to rely for the accomplishment of its ends. To impose on it the necessity of resorting to means which it can not control, which another government may furnish or withhold, would render its course precarious, the result of its measures uncertain, and create a dependence on other governments, which might disappoint its most important designs and is incompatible with the language of the Constitution. (Chief Justice Marshall, in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat., 316, 405, 424.)
> Both the State and the United States existed before the Constitution. The people, through that instrument, established a more perfect union by substituting a national government, acting with ample power directly upon the citizens, instead of the Confederate Government, which acted with powers greatly restricted only upon the States. (Chief Justice Chase, in Lane County v. Oregon, 7 Wall., 71, 76.)
> Among the powers expressly given to the National Government are the control of interstate commerce and the creation and management of a post-office system for the Nation. Article I, section 8, of the Constitution provides that "the Congress shall have power * * *. Third, to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes * * *. Seventh, to establish post offices and post roads."
> Under the power vested in Congress to establish post offices and post roads Congress has by a mass of legislation established the great post-office system of the country, with all its detail of organization, its machinery for the transaction of business, defining what shall be carried and what not, and the prices of carriage, and also prescribing penalties for all offenses against it.
> Obviously these powers given to the National Government over interstate commerce and in respect to the transportation of the mails were not dormant and unused. Congress had taken hold of these two matters and by various and specific acts had assumed and exercised the powers given to it, and was in the full discharge of its duty to regulate interstate commerce and carry the mails. The validity of such exercise and the exclusiveness of its control had been again and again presented to this court for consideration. (From United States Reports, 158, October term, 1894.)

Now, after the Civil War no interest was taken in road building in this country at all for 30 or 40 years, so far as the National Government was concerned. We find no records about it, and we do know that there was no interest taken in it. But of late years a great deal of interest has been taken in the subject, and I want to quote from the Democratic and Republican platforms for the benefit of gentlemen of this House belonging to both those great parties.

The Republican platform of 1908 contained the following:

> We recognize the social and economic advantages of good country roads, maintained more and more largely at the public expense and less and less at the expense of the abutting property owner. In this work we commend the growing practice of State aid and we approve the efforts of the National Agricultural Department by experiments and otherwise to make clear to the public the best methods of road construction.

In addition, we find the following in the national Democratic platform of 1908:

> We favor Federal aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of good roads.

Mr. Chairman, the bill that has been reported here I submit is a wise bill and should pass. I shall not undertake to go over it section by section.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAY). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. With pleasure.

Mr. CULLOP. I understood the gentleman to say that since the Civil War the National Government has taken no interest——

Mr. McKELLAR. Practically none.

Mr. CULLOP (continuing). In the building of country roads. About the close of the Civil War it diverted its attention from the building of domestic or dirt roads and gave its assistance to the building of railroads.

Mr. McKELLAR. That started quite a while before the war and continued after the war—in building the great transcontinental lines across the country.

Mr. CULLOP. And it gave away more than 200,000,000 of acres of the public domain, besides a large amount of money.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is correct.

Mr. LEVER. And the Government has expended $3,000,000 in the Philippine Islands and $2,000,000 in Porto Rico toward good roads.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; the gentleman is correct about that.

Speaking of the bill itself, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is almost an ideal measure. The opponents of any national aid to roads present three questions. One is the State rights question, which I have already discussed. The other is that it is a scheme of automobilists, the idle rich, to run over our country on splendid pikes. I stop right here to say that this bill certainly does not merit the criticism that it is for the benefit of the automobile owner. It is rather for the benefit of all classes of people, including the automobile owner. I have no doubt that every automobile owner in this country when he comes to consider the bill will be in favor of it, and why? Because he is in favor of all good roads; but it is not for his exclusive use and can not be used exclusively by him, but it is for the benefit of the farmer and the merchant and the mechanic and every other man in every other walk of life; and not only the men, but for the women, and children who go to school day after day.

The next proposition is that it costs too much. I want to discuss the question of cost. As I said, I come from a city, but I was born in the country. I have not been here a very long time, but some of the figures used by this Congress in appropriation of money are simply astounding to me. It is difficult for my mind to conceive the immense sums of money that are expended by Congress. I want to say that gentlemen are here who will vote hundreds of millions of dollars every year for a great Navy, because of a defense which it is very doubtful if we need. Yet, when it is proposed to build up our whole country by the expenditure of fifteen or twenty millions of dollars for good roads, they balk, because it is said that it costs too much.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. That would not be a fleabite.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am in favor of a great Navy. I do not mean to oppose it, but we must not go wild on such subjects.

We must not interfere with the growth or prosperity of our country, which we are here to serve in every capacity. Gentlemen who talk about cost—and I have no doubt my good friend from New York [Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL] is one of them—never hesitate to vote $90,000,000 per year for a standing army. Think of it, $90,000,000 per year for a machine with which to kill people, and not a cent to aid the school children in getting to school and the workingmen and the farmers of this country in getting themselves and their wares to market.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Agricultural Committee of this House has recommended to the House for passage a bill which is in direct accordance with the letter and spirit of the Democratic platform, and is in accordance with the spirit of the Republican platform. The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purposes of this act certain highways of the several States and the civil subdivisions thereof are classified as follows: Class A shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide composed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam graded, crowned, compacted, and maintained in such manner that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface; and all other roads having a road track not less than 9 feet wide of a construction equally smooth, firm, durable, and expensive, and continuously kept in proper repair. Class B shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface. Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times.

SEC. 2. That whenever the United States shall use any highway of any State or civil subdivision thereof which falls within classes A, B, or C for the purpose of transporting rural mail, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile for highways of class A, $20 per annum per mile for highways of class B, and $15 per annum per mile for highways of class C. The United States shall not pay any compensation or toll for such use of such highways other than that provided for in this section, and shall pay no compensation whatever for the use of any highway not falling within classes A, B, or C.

SEC. 3. That any question arising as to the proper classification of any road used for transporting rural mail shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 4. That the compensation herein provided for shall be paid at the end of each fiscal year by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Postmaster General to the officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act.

SEC. 5. That this act shall go into effect on the 1st day of July, 1913.

This bill was recently introduced by Mr. SHACKLEFORD, but it is the result of a conference of those Congressmen who have introduced road bills at this session, which is shown by an agreement which I shall make an appendix to my remarks.

In the first place, under the terms of this bill the United States Government does not have jurisdiction over a square inch of the States' territory. The United States Government does not have supervision even over any road in the country; it does not even say how or where the money which is appropriated shall go. Nay; it does not even say that the money appropriated shall go to the purpose of good roads. No jurisdiction or authority of any kind, nature, or description is retained by the Government over roads or over the money that is appropriated for this purpose under the provisions of this bill. As I have said before, the question of State rights can not be involved, because the Federal Government does not attempt by this bill to exercise the slightest right or jurisdiction over any road, but pays to the States or to the counties thereof a yearly rental for each mile of road used under the terms of the bill.

Another proposition is that this is not an automobile association bill. The kind of bill that the so-called idle rich or the automobile owners would want would be a bill providing for the building and maintenance of great national highways, leading from one part of the country to the other and from one State to the other, on which they could tour the country from time to time as inclination suggested.

This bill does not provide for any such roads, but on the contrary it does provide for the furnishing of money by which roads may be built and maintained for all of the people in the country. It is, indeed, a country people's bill and will inure to the benefit of the farmers and the gardeners and the wagon men generally all over the country. It is true that it will inure also to the benefit of the automobile owners, because they will use good roads just like all the rest of the community, but in the sense that it will furnish them great national highways this bill will not effect that purpose.

Another proposition is the question of expense. If improved roads average $22.50 per mile, the total appropriation will be $4,275,000. If half of the dirt roads of this country can be improved within the provisions of the act—which I think is exceedingly doubtful—the amount paid out on account of such roads will be $15,000,000, or a total of $19,275,000. This is an exceedingly small sum for so important a subject of legislation as roads. In comparison with what we expend for other lesser purposes, the amount of it should not be considered at all, as I shall hereafter more particularly point out.

There are several minor objections to the bill, which I now wish to touch upon. One of these objections is that there ought not to be a different amount paid by the Government for a different class road, but that the Government should simply employ an officer to get the roads at the cheapest price possible and pay for them according to what they were worth. The idea would be that if the Government wanted horses they would buy them in that manner. That kind of argument may be true as to horses, but it is wholly inapplicable to the question here at issue. The object here is not to get roads at the lowest price at which they may be obtained, for it would be hard to classify their values, but the object of the bill is to furnish an incentive to road building in this country, and to put every county and State in the Union on its mettle, so to speak, in the matter of road building; and the rentals mentioned are to be considered as an encouragement to road building, and thereby cause every county and every State to put forth its best efforts in order to get as much of the rentals as possible. I believe that at first the great object of States and counties will be to bring their roads within class C and afterwards, of course, they will be ambitious and bring them within class B, and then, of course, to get them within class A, where the maximum rentals are paid. No greater incentive to the building of roads could be established than that fixed by this bill. It will prove a solution to the whole question of road building and maintenance in this country. It is really difficult for me to see how anyone who really desires good roads could be opposed to this bill.

Another objection is that the Government ought not to pay anything for the use of public roads in transporting mails of the Government. A valued friend of mine in this House made this statement to me a few days ago, and yet the United States Government has been appropriating year by year from forty to fifty millions of dollars a year to the railroads of the country for the privilege of carrying United States mail over such roads. My friend's opinion and reasons are not consistent. If it is of value to pay the railroads of this country for the privilege of transporting mails over them—and no reasonable person would say that it is not—surely then it is of value to transport the mails over the public roads of this country; and there is no reason why the owners of such roads should not in like manner be compensated for their use, especially when it will mean the upbuilding of the whole country.

Another objection that was raised to the bill was that there was no provision therein even directing that this money should be expended by State and county governments for roads. This is true, and, in my judgment, it ought to be so. The bill ought to leave the matter entirely with the States and counties to say what shall be done with the money. I do not believe there is a reasonable man on the floor of this House who would say, in his judgment, that the counties and States of this Nation would not expend the rentals thus received for roads. But suppose they did not, what would be the effect? It would be that they could not get the rentals. They are obliged to keep up the roads within the three classes fixed by the bill; otherwise they get no money. When the matter was first suggested, it seemed to me that there ought to be a provision to the effect that such money should be used for the building of roads; but, upon reflection, the objection to such a course would be that the National Government would have to have an officer to see whether or not the money was so used, and thus there would be injected into the act the question of invasion of States rights. I believe that it is wholly unnecessary to have any provision as to what use the money shall be put to, because the effect of the act will cause the beneficiaries thereunder to use the money for the purpose of constructing and maintaining their roads.

Another objection that has been urged is that the bill is wrong because the States and counties having more improved roads will get so much more money than those that have fewer or no improved roads. It is undeniable that the States and counties having the most improved roads will get the most money, and it ought to be so. These States and counties have already gone to great expense for the improvement of their roads, and in any measure of this kind they ought to get more; but this does not prevent the States and counties having no improved roads from getting their full share of the appropriation. All they have to do is to expend money on their roads, and then they will be entitled to the same amount other States are which already have improved roads. Indeed, in my judgment, this is one of the principal advantages of the bill, in that it affords an incentive to States and counties to build improved roads. Rhode Island, having, as it does, 49 per cent of her roads improved, will unquestionably get the largest percentage of rentals. Massachusetts, with practically the same percentage, will come next; then Indiana, with 36 per cent; then Ohio, with 27 per cent; and so on down the line. It is perfectly true that States like West Virginia, with less than 2 per cent of her roads improved, and Texas, with just about 2 per cent of her roads improved, will get very little money in classes A and B; but those States are now expending very large sums of money on roads, and with this additional incentive, no doubt, they will soon be high up among the States that get the benefits for having improved roads.

Now, Mr. Chairman, before discussing further the question of expense, I wish to speak for a few moments about the general subject of roads. The high cost of living is one of the great questions before the people of this country. Students of political economy everywhere are undertaking to solve this mighty problem, and our politicians and statesmen would be delighted to find the remedy therefor. In my judgment—and I believe I can prove it—one of the remedies for the high cost of living is the establishment of good roads. In this connection I desire to call the attention of the House to a comparison of conditions in this country with the conditions in France on the subject of roads. In the United States a team in the worst hauling season is able to transport an average of only about 800 pounds, while in France every good draft horse is expected to draw about 3,300 pounds a distance of more than 18 miles a day any day in the year. As a result of the difference in road conditions, the farmers of France haul their products to market on an average cost of about 10 cents per ton per mile, and in some cases even less than that, whereas in America our farmers are forced to pay for transporting their products to market about 23 cents per ton per mile. When we take into consideration the vast tonnage that is yearly hauled over the roads of this country what an immense saving it would be to the farmers of this country to have good roads. It has been estimated by the Office of Public Roads of this Government that the saving on this kind of transportation alone would amount to somewhere in the neighborhood of $1,000,000 a day or $350,000,000 per year. The people of France have more money per capita than any other people in the world and their condition is exceedingly prosperous. Country life there is exceedingly delightful and pleasant, and more because of good roads than for any other reason; indeed, it has been claimed that the building and maintenance of these roads, which are the best in the world, is of more value to France than her railroads. It has prevented her population from flocking to the cities, as is the case in America. One of the greatest questions now before our people is the undue movement of the country population to the cities and what is necessary to prevent it. Good roads and the conditions that are arising from having good roads will do more to prevent it than anything else. It gives the people of the country better social advantages, better educational advantages, and as far as aid and material welfare and happiness is concerned, nothing could be of greater advantage to them, with the one exception of school facilities. It will enable the farmer to economize time and force in transportation between farm and market; it will enable him to take advantage of the market fluctuations in buying and selling; it will enable him to carry larger loads; it will enable him to buy and sell his products cheaper and still make more money on the transaction; it will enable him to transport his farm products as well as his purchases during times of comparative leisure; it will enable him to haul in bad weather, which is now practically impossible in most of the counties in any of the States; it will reduce the wear and tear on his horse and on his harness and on his vehicle; and, more than all else, it will enhance to an enormous extent the market values of all of their farms.

It is argued that the expense will be too great. From a report that was made by Mr. Morris O. Eldridge, chief of the records of the Office of Public Roads, printed in 1907, but which shows conditions in the year 1904, there was expended by all the States and counties of this Nation a little more than $80,000,000 for the construction and maintenance of public roads. Of this sum about $20,000,000 was furnished in labor and not in money, so that there was actually appropriated in money by the State and county governments of the Nation about $60,000,000. Ohio led at that time with an expenditure of $5,706,000; New York came next with an expenditure of $5,692,000; Indiana came in next with an expenditure of $4,335,000; Illinois came fourth with an expenditure of $4,210,000. It was further shown that Indiana had more miles of improved roads than any other State in the Union. Tennessee has only about 13 per cent of her roads improved. A like report has been gotten out since that time in the present year, but showing conditions in the year 1909. This second report shows that there were some 40,000 more miles of improved roads in 1909 than there were in 1904, but the second report does not show the amounts appropriated in the year 1909 by the United States, but an estimate probably would not exceed $100,000,000. Suppose then that this bill carries only $20,000,000 per year; certainly it will be of mighty benefit to the cause of road building and road maintenance in this country. If by building good roads we can reduce the cost of transportation in rural communities from 23 cents a ton per mile to 10 cents per ton per mile; if we can make conditions of country life more attractive and thereby prevent the undue flocking of people to the cities and the many evils attendant thereon; if we can increase the value of all farm lands; if we can aid in the reduction of the high cost of living; if we can give all the country children of this country better school facilities; if we can give all the country people better educational, religious, and social advantages, is it not our duty to pass this bill? We spend in round numbers some $125,000,000 per year on our Navy; we spend some $90,000,000 per year on our Army; we spend some $26,000,000 per year in cleaning out and improving our waterways and harbors; we spend $47,000,000 a year for carrying our mails on the railroads of this country, and yet we do not expend a cent for the use, construction, or maintenance of public roads, which is more important than all of the foregoing except railroad transportation. In other words we are spending mighty sums for our supposed defense when it is doubtful if we need any defense, while we spend practically nothing for our general welfare, which is of far more importance in this day and time of the world's history. I am not opposed to the Navy or to the Army. I believe in both. A reasonable amount for both should always be appropriated, but I believe it is foolish to run wild on such subjects and overlook the most obvious needs of our country.

Another reason why this bill should pass is because of the increased use of roads by the Government in carrying out the limited parcel-post provision of this bill, which I believe will pass at this time. This will vastly increase the use of country roads by the Government, and it will bring all country people in closer touch with their Government.

Nearly all other Governments have the parcel post. It has been a success with them. It has come to the United States, and has come to stay. It may be postponed, and a general law probably should be postponed until we know just what is best, but it will not be sidetracked, because it affords cheaper transportation of goods for the people, and naturally the people want it and will have it. The express companies are leeches upon the body politic. They have had their day. They must lower their rates or go out of business. Our country merchants and our city merchants need have no fear of a parcel post. It will benefit them as well as the public generally to get cheaper transportation for their wares. They need not fear the large mail-order houses in the great cities. We will get all the facts under this bill and enact a law that will protect all merchants alike and benefit all the public.

Down in my country the people have no concrete, selfish connecting link, practically speaking, between them and our National Government; there are no monthly or quarterly pension checks to remind them of the Government at Washington; $125,000,000 appropriated for the Navy means nothing to them, for they are far removed from anything that even pertains to the Navy; $90,000,000 for the Army is to them simply an array of figures, as the Army and its movements and its interests are, so far as they are concerned, a thing apart; $27,000,000 for rivers and harbors means little to the people of west Tennessee, where there have been no river improvements in so long that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. Never a cent does the tenth congressional district get for her levees, and the city of Memphis has to build her own levees to keep the water out as best she can, which sometimes she does and sometimes she does not. The water has gone so unprecedentedly high this year, however, that we are greatly in hopes of getting some much-needed aid from the Mississippi River Commission, and if we do not I feel sure that this House and this Congress will give us aid.

I do not mean to cast any reflections on the Mississippi River Commission, for I have no doubt that it is doing the best it can with the money it has; but we should give it more money. Fifty million dollars for railroad postal service means nothing to our people, because there are no railroad owners in Memphis, and they give value received in stamps for all their letter transportation. As I said before to my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL], the tangible connection between my people and the Government is composed largely of garden seed and a lofty patriotism. He knows the benefits his district is receiving from the National Government. Does he conscientiously think these are being fairly and evenly divided, comparing the benefits that his district is receiving with those that mine is receiving?

Mr. Chairman, the people I represent are a brave, sturdy, and an optimistic people. They are taxed to help keep up our splendid naval armament, and pay their proportion of the $125,000,000 claimed to be necessary for that purpose without a word of complaint, notwithstanding the fact that they have not a mile of seacoast and that a battleship could not get within 500 miles of them. They are a peace-loving people, and would rather our Government would aid in building up a great merchant marine to promote our trade and commerce with the nations of the world, and thus contribute to their welfare and happiness and prosperity and to the welfare and happiness and prosperity of their fellow citizens. Yet when their Government says millions for the pomp and parade of power by the patrolling of the sea with death-dealing Dreadnoughts and not one cent toward securing supremacy in foreign trade, they have no word of complaint. They are taxed to keep up our Army and pay their proportion of the $90,000,000 per year used for that purpose, though they do not believe in a standing army in time of peace or in the idea that it is our duty to give so large a part of our hard-earned wealth toward governing the far-off islands of the sea, whose inhabitants are neither desirous of or grateful for our assistance. They would much prefer that at least a portion of these millions should be spent in educating the ignorant of our own land, and in making them better citizens and happier and more prosperous men and women; but when their Government says that one-tenth of all their taxes shall go for foreign missions in the way of holding the Philippines and other islands, whether the distant and colored foreigners want our aid or not, they still make no complaint, though they do not believe that this is the legitimate sphere of our Government. They are taxed to pay our enormous pension list, and they pay their proportion of these $160,000,000 cheerfully to the extent that they believe that the money goes to the bona fide defenders of their country, for they believe that the honest and courageous defender of his country should be cared for by the Government in his declining years. They would much prefer that the rule of correcting military records 50 years after those records were made and the promotion of officers on the retired list should be abolished, and that the large sums thus annually spent should be used for other and better purposes; but their Government's acts are their acts in the premises, and still they make no complaint.

They are taxed to keep up Army posts on the desolate plains of Wyoming and on the inaccessible heights of Fort Duchesne and to build useless $75,000 public buildings at the hamlets of Sundance and Kiosk on desolate western plains. They believe this is a useless extravagance, but still they do not complain. They are taxed to keep up the great Post Office Department of the Government, and they believe that much of the $250,000,000 spent by that department of our Government is injudiciously spent in extravagant contracts with railroad lines and steamship companies; but as long as they can get a letter through the mails directly by paying for the service its full value they still do not complain. And so when the Government taxes them for the benefit of the Steel Trust, and the Woolen Trust, and the Tobacco Trust, and the Meat Trust, and the Butter Trust, and the Sugar Trust, and the Beef Trust, they still work on, complaining just a little, but optimistically hoping for better things. But while not complaining very much, Mr. Chairman, they do think that inasmuch as these special interests receive so much at the hands of the Government and these other portions of the country receiving so many benefits from the Government not received by them—they only receiving garden seed—that they might be permitted to get a small rental for the use of their roads and a little aid in keeping the Government's water, the great Mississippi River, out of their homes. In asking this they are perfectly willing that other portions of the country should receive the same proportionate, and even greater, rental for their roads, and they are willing to take even less protection from the Government's water than other portions of the country get. But they do want to feel that their Government has a little interest in their welfare and a little regard for their protection. Under the circumstances is it asking too much that our people should want this road bill to pass? Is it asking too much that their application to Congress should be granted that their homes might be protected from the waters of the great Mississippi River?

Seriously, Mr. Chairman, Tennessee has always done her full part by our great Nation. Though but a Territory at the time, her sons bore the brunt of the fight at Kings Mountain, which was the turning point in our war for national independence. In the War of 1812 it was largely her sons, under the leadership of the dauntless Andrew Jackson, who at New Orleans broke the pride and power of the British Army and made that great nation feel that it would never do again to wage war against American arms. In the Civil War Tennessee furnished almost as many troops to the defense of the Union cause as Rhode Island, Vermont, or New Hampshire. In the Spanish War the State was made a rendezvous for the American Army, and her sons almost with one accord volunteered in behalf of their country's cause. They are a dauntless race of people and stand ever ready to defend their common country and to protect its honor. But they do wish for their Government to treat them fairly and to divide more evenly the benefits of that Government, and they believe it will.

Mr. Chairman, I hope this bill will pass, and afterwards, at another time, this Congress will give our Tennessee people protection from the floods of the great Father of Waters.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield 27 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, the proposition to which I want to address myself is involved in a bill, H. R. 12823, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the 1st day of January, 1913, it shall be unlawful for any railway company engaged in interstate and foreign commerce by carrying or transporting goods, wares, and merchandise from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or from any foreign country to any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or from any State or Territory or the District of Columbia to any foreign country, to lease, sublet, or permit any other person, firm, company, or corporation the right to carry or transport for hire articles of commerce over its lines of railway, either in cars or facilities furnished by the railway company or by any other person, firm, company, or corporation.

SEC. 2. That from and after the 1st day of January, 1913, it shall be the duty of all railways engaged in business as common carriers in interstate and foreign commerce to furnish cars and other facilities for carrying and transporting parcels and packages on passenger, mail, or express trains without the medium or intervention of the so-called express companies.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of all railway companies subject to the provisions of this act to make, promulgate, and publish schedules of parcel freight rates, to be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, as required by section 6 of the interstate-commerce act as amended June 29, 1906, and June 18, 1910.

SEC. 4. That the managing officers and agents of any railway company subject to the provisions of this act that violate any of the provisions hereof shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished, on conviction, for each offense by a fine of not less than $1,000 and by imprisonment for not less than 6 months.

SEC. 5. That it is herein made the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the power conferred upon it by the interstate-commerce act and its amendments, to enforce the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill that I first introduced about two years ago and again during the last session of this Congress. There was considerable discussion of the bill in some of the metropolitan newspapers when it was first introduced. This led to a correspondence with me relative to the bill, and I have here on my desk now about 5,000 letters and resolutions upon the subject. I think it is safe to say that not to exceed a dozen of them oppose the general purpose of the bill. My proposition is to eliminate the express companies entirely from the business of carrying parcels or packages and require the railroad companies to file rates, to be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, for the carrying of parcels as they file rates for the carrying of heavier freight, and in that way bring about a large saving to the sellers and buyers of parcels that are carried now by the express companies. It is needless for me to say that there has long been a widespread protest against the extortionate charges made by the express companies. I want to avoid needless criticism. I want to put the proposition clearly upon its merits and upon the right of the people of this country to have their chartered common carriers perform all the functions of common carriers that is done on their lines.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman's plan embrace the delivery of parcels by the railroad companies after they reach their destination as well as their transportation?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; that, of course, is a part of the business.

Mr. ANTHONY. That the railroads shall assume the complete functions of the express companies?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Exactly so, and employ the same men to do the work, and furnish these men a better employer and, in many instances, higher and better wages, working under more satisfactory conditions than they do to-day.

Mr. BOWMAN. As in the case of the Great Northern Railway Co.?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The Great Northern Railway Co. does its own express business.

Mr. BOWMAN. Under contract with individuals in each city.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; to pick up and deliver its packages. We pay anywhere from three to five times as much for carrying packages of a parcel nature as any other country in the world.

We should, perhaps, expect express charges to be higher per ton here than abroad. But no necessary economic cause is known which justifies a substantially higher proportion or ratio of the express to the freight charges here as compared with other countries, however. The average express charge per ton here is shown to be $31.20, while the average freight charge is $1.90 per ton, giving a ratio of the express charge to the freight charge of 16 (16.42) to 1. This express charge includes the cost of such pick-up and delivery service as is rendered, covering, it is thought, about 90 per cent of the traffic. I will give a table embracing 11 countries, which shows the ratios of these charges. The table includes all countries where the express data are clearly distinguishable from general freight statistics:

Ratios of average express charges to average freight charges in 11 countries.

Countries.	Average express charge per ton.	Average freight charge per ton.	Ratios of average express to freight charges.
Argentina	$6.51	$1.95	3.2 to 1
Austria	3.77	.74	5.0 to 1
Belgium	4.92	.53	9.3 to 1
Denmark	5.49	.87	6.3 to 1
France	6.88	.95	7.2 to 1
Germany	3.80	.76	5.0 to 1
Hungary	3.68	.93	3.9 to 1
Netherlands	2.43	.67	3.6 to 1
Norway	1.90	.49	5.0 to 1
Prussia	4.32	.86	5.0 to 1
Average for 10 countries			5.23 to 1
United States	31.20	1.90	16.42 to 1

The express companies in this country now charge $31.20 a ton for carrying packages; an 8-cent postal rate would be $160 the ton and a 12-cent $240 the ton, the only advantage being delivery of the package in the country when it could pay such a rate. About $17 per ton should pay every reasonable charge for this service when the service is performed by the railroads, as I now propose.

There is less of parcel carriage upon the railways of this country in proportion to the other freight than in any other country of the world, and all because of the practically prohibitive rates charged by the express companies. Why are these extortionate charges made? Why is it that American express charges are higher than any other people have to pay for carrying like packages on the railways of other countries? The reason is simply this—the intervention of the express companies. An express business was done before the railways were made. It was a business of carrying small parcels across the country. They did that on stagecoaches. As soon as the railway companies were built it was most natural that they should give up their stagecoach and make arrangements with the railway companies to carry their parcels on the railway trains. These contracts have been made from year to year by the express companies since the advent of the American railway. There are 13 express companies, and they control the small freight business of the country to-day, which should be done by the railroads that are chartered as common carriers.

These express companies are not chartered as common carriers. They are voluntary associations or companies or individuals, and too often some of the higher officials of the railway company that has a contract with the express company are interested in the express company, to the detriment of the stockholders of the railroad company. The contract made by the railway company with the express company is of doubtful authority. That is to say, it is doubtful, if the question had been raised early, whether or not the railroad company, that is chartered as a common carrier, had a right to delegate or lease or sublet to a concern that is not chartered as a common carrier the right to carry or to do the business of a common carrier on its lines.

Mr. LOBECK. Then the gentleman is against letting subsidiary contracts?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The common carrier is responsible to the public for the transportation of its products. Here are concerns made up of individuals or of companies, as the case may be, without charter authority, acting as the common carrier and doing a general business as such.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman does not doubt the express companies are common carriers?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, they have been declared to be so by statute for purposes of regulation, but not by charter. I have been careful to note only that they were not chartered as common carriers. We declared them common carriers in 1906 so we could control them. I thought then, and I think now, they are mere parasites on the railroads and that they should be entirely eliminated.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman, if I may. The railroad company now carries any size package delivered to it?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. At a fixed rate?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not intend to have packages carried at those rates by the railroad company?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, that is a matter of detail. What I intend is that parcels that are now carried by the wish of the consignee or consignor, by express rather than by freight, shall be carried by the railroad company rather than by the express company.

Mr. MANN. I understand. It is six of one and half a dozen of the other who carries it. The question is the service. The railroad company will carry any package now by freight at a rate fixed?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman would not expect that the railroad company would raise the rates on packages that are now carried by freight nor would he expect them to carry packages by express at the same rate.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, not at all. I expect the railroad companies to file different rates for carrying parcels on express, passenger, and mail trains from the rates they file for carrying freight on their freight trains.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman's experience with the railroad companies lead him to believe that transferring packages from one railroad to another would produce expedition by having them do that instead of having one company do it?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, that is a question of detail that is involved in this problem; but the gentleman from Illinois now purchases a ticket to Chicago, and he goes on that ticket clear through over probably half a dozen or a dozen different lines of railroad.

Mr. MANN. Yes; and it is a good deal of trouble for the gentleman to do that, but he moves himself; the package does not move itself; it has to be moved by some one else. The gentleman says it is a matter of detail. In my judgment, it is the whole substance of the question, whether the railroad companies separate taking packages to be delivered to any house, requiring those packages to be transferred at terminal points, will do it with the same expedition that one company does that is prepared to take care of it where there is no conflict between the companies.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am aware that there are difficulties about the question, but I often check a grip and it goes through on the same train I do, on the same train that the express company takes packages of similar size through, and it goes through just as rapidly as they do, and I see no reason why, with a similar check or stamp, any package might not go through on the same train and with as good service.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman has never had difficulty about getting his baggage, he is exceptionally lucky.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, I have had difficulty about getting express, and it is not at all unusual that express packages are lost or delayed in their delivery. I am not pretending that any system of carrying small parcels is absolutely perfect or can be made so. I think a check or stamp system will insure good service—with checks we get good service for baggage in fast trains making through connection. We get good service for through mail on the same trains with a stamp system.

If both of these plans or rules that could be devised fail, then the plan of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] could be adopted—that is, the Government making similar arrangements with the railroads for postal express to that it now has for mail.

But the fact is that the large majority of packages in which the country is interested are carried but a short distance, and very often over the same line of railroad. The long-distance small package is a very small per cent of the number of packages that are carried in this country. The average distance is about 200 miles.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. I think the report of the Post Office Department shows that the average haul for fourth-class matter under present conditions is 687 miles.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am not talking about mail matter; I am talking about express matter, and the average distance is 196 miles. The railroad companies can do this service just as well as the express companies. There is no economic reason why they can not, by adopting a check or stamp system for the safe conduct of a package from point of origin to point of destination.

Now, will it make a saving to the people of the country? Nothing will be of advantage if it will not result in saving to the people without denying anyone of just and legal rights. I concede this bill, if enacted into law, would deprive certain individuals and certain companies of privileges they now have by sufferance, and which, in my judgment, they ought not to have at all; but there would be an accruing benefit to the whole people and to the stockholders of the railroads. It is common knowledge now that the express companies have from year to year gathered up from the people of the United States enormous and colossal sums of money, and the dividends they pay have become a scandal.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield to a question right there?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. What percentage does the gentleman claim that the express companies are making now on the business done?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The express companies give the railroad companies about 47½ per cent of their gross receipts.

The physical property of all the express companies in the United States is somewhere about $25,000,000. The gross receipts in 1909 were $123,000,000; $63,000,000 of that was given to the railroad companies, and the express companies had the rest of it. The railroad companies own the express cars, pay for keeping them in repair, keep them heated and lighted, and cared for, and in many instances the railway employees performed the service of handling the parcels or packages that are offered for transportation.

Mr. COOPER. The figures the gentleman gave, then, I understand, show the net profits of the express companies to be from 200 to 231 per cent. Is that so?

Mr. CAMPBELL. On their investment; yes. I am unwilling to give the express companies any property in their contracts, for the reason that, in my judgment, they never had a right to acquire such contracts from common carriers chartered by the States.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield for a correction there?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. I understood the gentleman to say the gross receipts of the express companies were $123,000,000 in 1909?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think that was what I stated.

Mr. CULLOP. It was $132,000,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL. One hundred and thirty-two millions of dollars is correct. I am glad to have the correction. I had other figures in mind.

The same employees who now pick up and deliver the express packages for the 13 express companies could perform that service as railway employees, and from the letters I have here I feel confident, with much more satisfaction to the employee, than with his present employer. I have letters here that I am admonished not to publish under any circumstances, nor to divulge the name of the writers.

Mr. FOWLER. Why?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Why? Because they are afraid they would lose their jobs.

Mr. FOWLER. That is what I wanted you to say.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is the reason, exactly. No one has been able to give a good reason for continuing the express companies. Every reason is in favor of the railroads doing the business. The express companies are parasites that get millions annually out of the public that may be saved. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remaining three minutes that I have to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

Mr. LANGLEY. Before beginning may I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] if he will yield me five minutes also?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield the gentleman five minutes in addition to the three.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] is entitled to eight minutes.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to challenge one or two of the statements made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] regarding the Rural Mail Service. The gentleman made the statement that the rural service all over the country is paralyzed. He made the further statement, in answer to an interruption by myself, that there was one year during which no rural routes were established, and he suggested that I could corroborate these statements if I would make inquiry of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. I had already talked a number of times with that official and am somewhat familiar with the subject; but, in order to get specific information, I telephoned that office the substance of the statements made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] and I have here the exact figures as to the number of rural routes established under the present administration; and let me say, in passing, that I did not get in my telephone conversation with that office any corroboration of the statements of the gentleman from Mississippi, as he said I should.

In the year 1909—and I am referring now to the net increases—there were 1,351 rural routes established, 451 in 1910, 577 in 1911, and 543 in 1912.

I am informed that no more rural routes will be opened during the present fiscal year, but that work has already begun on those to be established during the next fiscal year. In the course of this preliminary work the establishment of 21 routes, beginning July 1 next, has already been agreed upon.

It is easy for gentlemen flippantly to charge neglect of duty on the part of public officials. I have recently had occasion to read some of the speeches delivered in both branches of Congress in previous sessions, and I have been greatly surprised at the number of gentlemen who criticized in the broadest terms the management of the Post Office Department. I am glad to notice that during the prolonged debate on this pending measure the tendency to criticize that department so broadly has almost entirely disappeared. As far as I can recall, the only criticism of that character has been indulged in by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The postal service is the greatest Government enterprise in the world, employing, I believe, about 300,000 people; involving travel by carriers, messengers, and mail trains aggregating almost a billion miles annually. I venture to say that in the history of the Post Office Department there has not been more progress made in the general development of the various branches of the work since its organization than has been accomplished since the present Postmaster General took hold of it.

I have before me one of Postmaster General Hitchcock's annual reports, in which he mentions 30 distinct improvements that have been made under his administration, not one of which, I believe, could be successfully questioned. I might also add what gentlemen already know, that he has changed a deficit of more than $17,000,000, under which the department groaned when he took charge, to a surplus of more than $200,000. That alone, considering the enormous amount of business conducted by this great department, is an accomplishment which does honor to Postmaster General Hitchcock. [Applause.]

I wish particularly to point out that the economies by which the Postmaster General has succeeded in transforming a huge deficit into a surplus have not resulted in any crippling of the service. There has been no harmful saving. The result has been attained by the cutting out of wasteful expenditures and the introduction of the most modern business methods. Mr. Hitchcock's policy throughout has been to extend the service as fast as population warrants and to handle more scientifically the increasing volume of mail.

To show how the service has been extended, let me tell you that during Postmaster General Hitchcock's administration 4,133 new post offices have been established; carrier delivery has been provided in 212 cities; 2,748 new rural routes, covering 66,358 miles, have been opened; the force of postal employees has been increased by more than 8,000. Furthermore, the economies that wiped out the deficit have enabled the Postmaster General to adopt a more liberal policy in the compensation of employees, the total expended for salaries last year being $14,000,000 greater than it was two years ago, while the average annual salaries have been substantially increased.

Thus, gentlemen, you can perceive the extraordinary spectacle of a deficit wiped out, a surplus put in its place, while at the same time the service is greatly extended and improved and the employees are better paid, and also assured of one day's rest in every seven.

While I am on the subject of the Post Office Department I can not refrain from calling attention to the remarkable success achieved by the present Postmaster General in his crusade against the swindlers who use the mails to defraud. These criminals prey upon a class of inexperienced persons, largely, who can least afford to do without the money that is taken from them. The medical swindlers, not only take the money of their victims, but also leave them broken in health, perhaps on the very verge of death. Against them Postmaster General Hitchcock has waged a vigorous war of extermination.

At the outset of his administration he virtually abandoned the fraud order, as being of very little permanent good, the swindler against whom such an order was issued often resuming his practices under another name or in another place. Under the present régime the swindlers are arrested as soon as sufficient evidence is obtained, and then they are put behind the bars. Very few who have been arrested have escaped conviction. During 1911 there were arrested 529 such persons who had obtained by their devious methods more than $77,000,000 of the American people's money. These arrests and convictions, besides putting out of business the larger dishonest operators, act as a powerful deterrent on the minor offenders, who are more easily restrained by fear than are the richer and more influential get-rich-quick men. The value of the protection thus given to the people is almost incalculable.

Another boon to the whole country is the postal-savings bank, the first 48 of which were opened in January of 1911. These experimental offices proved so successful that the system was rapidly extended, until now it includes almost all of the 7,500 presidential offices and several thousand offices of the fourth class. I am informed that after 12 months of operation the deposits reached the sum of twelve millions of dollars. I am of the opinion, Mr. Chairman, that this amount of money would probably not have been available for circulation if it had not been for the postal savings banks. Some of it would have been hoarded, some of it would have been squandered, and a large fraction of it would have been sent out of the country by foreign-born citizens.

Mr. Chairman, when I consider to what a successful issue Postmaster General Hitchcock has brought the measures for which he has obtained the authorization of Congress, when I consider his wide experience in the affairs of the postal service, I feel confident that his recommendations regarding the parcel post and the readjustment of railway-mail pay, which he urges, if they should be carried out, would result successfully and to the great advantage of the masses of the people.

Let me add that nearly 20 years ago I was a schoolmate of Frank Hitchcock. I formed an estimate of his character then which I have cherished ever since. I have watched his career with pride and admiration, and, in my judgment, there is not in the Federal service to-day a more competent, a more faithful, a more courteous and obliging gentleman than Frank Hitchcock. I am glad to have this opportunity on the floor of this House to pay this tribute to my old schoolmate and friend. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] one hour.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, as has often been said, the Post Office appropriation bill excites more interest amongst the membership of this House, taking the membership as a whole, than does any other appropriation bill that is considered here. The reason for this is evident; the entire population of the United States is personally and vitally interested in the postal service.

In reference to the bill under consideration now I am very glad to be able to state that in all the 14 years that I have been here there has been less debate this year on the present bill, under the five-minute rule, than there has been in any other year during my service in this House. The reason for this also is evident, and it can only mean that the bill brought in by the Post Office Committee with a united report, agreed to by both Democrats and Republicans, meets with popular favor.

The committee brings to the House of Representatives the greatest appropriation bill which has ever appeared in this House, and the greatest which has ever appeared in any legislative body in the world, so far as I am informed, amounting in round numbers to $260,000,000.

The regular part of the bill containing the usual appropriations for the support of the postal service and making provision for the expansion, growth, and development of that service, has excited so little debate in the House that it is a matter of comment. But I shall not take up the time of the committee in discussing what has already been passed upon by the House and is now incorporated in the bill.

A great deal of new legislation is contained in the bill; more new legislation, in fact, than has ever been brought into the House in any former Post Office appropriation bill during the 10 years of my service on this great committee. This legislation, in the opinion of the members of the Post Office Committee, is both wise and necessary, and will result in the impovement of the postal service. We believe that it will result in giving to the American people better and more efficient mail facilities. We believe that the legislation proposed here is demanded by the spirit of the times, and that it is a step in the march of progress. We believe further that the American people should have what is due them and what we propose to give them—the very best in the way of postal facilities that can be given, conditions considered. No one therefore can accuse the Post Office Committee of the House of Representatives of being retrogressive. We are progressive, keeping up with the spirit of the times and doing, or trying to do, for the American people, so far as postal legislation is concerned, that which we should do in keeping abreast with progress. In the bill are 11 sections proposed by the Post Office Committee, which have been made in order by a rule adopted by the House. In addition to that, other matters have been made in order.

I shall not have time to discuss each and every one of these propositions in detail. In a great bill like this it is, practically speaking, impossible for one man to take up and discuss in detail all of the new and involved legislation proposed. So what I shall say in reference to what the Post Office Committee has proposed in the 11 sections I have mentioned will be brief. It will not be more than a cursory mention, so to speak, as to the majority of them.

In the first section we propose that after the 1st of July, 1917, all railway post-office cars shall be constructed of steel, with underframe of steel, or of equally indestructible material. After July 1, 1912, not less than 20 per cent of this class of cars shall be placed in operation annually, and thereafter no contracts shall be entered into by the Post Office Department for the construction of wooden cars. This is necessary, for heretofore, as a rule, railway post-office cars have been constructed of wood, and as they were often placed next to the tender, with the great passenger coaches behind them, the inevitable result in case of accident was that the railway postal clerks were the ones who generally suffered the worst injuries.

In section 2 of the new legislation it is provided that any contractor furnishing supplies to the Post Office Department or to the postal service who shall enter into or propose to enter into any combination relative to any bid for furnishing supplies, or who shall fix the price, or who shall give or propose to give any consideration or inducement to any other person to bid at a specified price shall be guilty of a crime. And why should he not be held guilty of a crime? Why should not that be written into the law? Why should not the Government of the United States be protected from the dishonest practices of persons who enter into combination for the purpose of fleecing the Government?

Section 3 of the new legislation simply protects the postal service by requiring mail clerks employed on vessels in the naval service to give such bond as may be deemed necessary to protect the Government from loss should some clerk prove to be dishonest. No one will dispute the wisdom of this proposed legislation.

Section 4 of the new legislation proposed by the Post Office Committee is intended to correct what often amounts to an injustice after the mails have been weighed. For the purpose of weighing the mails the United States is divided into four divisions. In each of these divisions the mail is weighed once in four years, and it sometimes happens that mail for Cuba or the West Indies, for instance, which was carried over the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad at the time of the weighing, has, for some reason satisfactory to the Post Office Department, been transferred or diverted to the Southern Railway. Under the present law no readjustment of the weight of this mail and the compensation paid for carrying the mail which has been diverted can be had until the next weighing period, and that may be any period of time short of four years. Should not this be corrected by amending the law?

Section 5 provides that clerks and carriers in first and second class post offices shall have their day's work limited so that the 8 hours of service shall be performed in a period of 10 consecutive hours. That provision needs no comment.

Section 6 simply gives to each person in the classified service of the United States employed in the postal service the right of free speech and the right to appeal to Congress, or to communicate with his Representative in Congress, relative to any grievance between him and the Government in the discharge of his duties as a public servant, or other matter affecting him. This section is intended to repeal the notorious gag rule or order first issued some years ago by Theodore Roosevelt when he was President of the United States.

Section 7 provides for classifying the railway postal clerks. I will stop here long enough to say that they are about the only class of postal employees in the classified service who are not classified according to some rule or regulation that has regularity for its basis. Heretofore the classification of railway postal clerks in nearly all essential particulars was a matter of departmental order and regulation, under what is generally known as the scheme of organization in the Second Assistant Postmaster General's office.

Under this procedure it sometimes happened that great injustice was done to railway postal clerks, and it is proposed to correct this.

Section 9 gives to the rural letter carriers $74 a year increase of pay on a standard route of 24 miles. This section was framed by me on the basis that pay for the rural delivery service be on a mileage basis. This has been the contention of the carriers for years and years. It is a fact that under the present law, which gives the Post Office Department discretion to a very large extent in fixing the rural carriers' pay at a sum not exceeding $1,000 per annum, on standard routes of 24 miles, the rate of pay fixed by Executive order in the case of about 6 per cent of the carriers on certain routes less than 24 miles long, is slightly more than it would be under the proposed amendment of existing law. I take it, however, that an amendment will be offered to correct this defect in this proposed amendment, increasing the rural carriers' pay.

Personally I will say that at present I think the salary of the rural carriers should be fixed at $1,100 a year, at least on the standard routes, and especially in view of the fact that we propose to impose upon the rural carrier the additional labor of carrying parcels on their routes. I also think that a majority fraction of a mile should be counted.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Does the gentleman not think that the salary ought to be increased to as much as that received by the city letter carrier?

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to my friend from Georgia that $1,100 would place them on that basis.

Mr. TRIBBLE. No; some of the city carriers get $1,200.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman will take the average pay of the city carrier, he will find that it does not exceed $1,074.

Mr. TRIBBLE. We will have an amendment prepared at the proper time.

Mr. FINLEY. I stated that myself.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, do I understand the gentleman to say that the carrier on the rural routes of less than 24 miles would not get as much as they get now?

Mr. FINLEY. I stated this, that under the present rule fixing the carrier's pay by executive order of the Postmaster General, about 6 per cent of the carriers on some of the routes under 24 miles in length will receive slightly less pay than they would under this proposed increase of pay. That is by reason of the fact that the basis under this executive order, we will say, is from 6 to 8 miles, or 8 to 10 miles, or 18 to 20 miles, and so on. On a basis of 18 to 20 miles my recollection is that under the present regulations of the department, carrying out the present law, the carrier would receive $5 more pay than he would under the proposed increase provided for by the Post Office Committee in this bill.

Mr. STERLING. That is on routes 18 and 20 miles long?

Mr. FINLEY. That is my recollection.

Mr. STERLING. Seventy-four dollars additional, then, would not pay them for this decrease?

Mr. FINLEY. That is my recollection.

Mr. STERLING. That is not right, is it?

Mr. FINLEY. I take it that that will be corrected. When the parcel-post system on rural routes is inaugurated it will inevitably follow that the receipts, or the revenues, of the postal service will be largely increased. The Fourth Assistant Postmaster General estimates that the increase from this rural parcel-post service will amount to anywhere from twelve to sixteen millions of dollars a year. I can not agree to that proposition, to begin with. I do not think it will amount to that much for the first year or two. I firmly believe in a few years it will amount to more than that amount. I am satisfied in my own mind, however, from observation—and perhaps my opinion is not worth any more or as much as that of some one else—that the revenue from this source for the first year will amount to at least $6,000,000, possibly $7,000,000 or $8,000,000, and will gradually increase. I am firmly of the opinion that for this added labor and work of carrying the parcels placed upon the rural carriers an increased compensation should be paid them. And why? It has been said that they have the equipment. I do not agree with the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General when he states that only 15 per cent would be required to change their equipment.

In my judgment, more than one-half of the rural carriers will be required to change their equipment, because when they commence to carry parcels the weight that they will carry daily will be much increased. As time goes on the number of parcels they carry each day will increase, and it follows necessarily and inevitably that they will do a great deal more work than at present. Many of them to-day ride motor cycles, and I believe there are a few that ride horseback. In my section the majority of them ride in H. M. T. buggies. Of course, no young Member of Congress knows what that means, but all of the older Members do. The carriers, therefore, would be required to increase and enlarge their equipment for purposes of carrying parcels on rural routes, and I take it that when the rural parcel-post system is in full operation hardly any carrier in all this country will be able to ride in a buggy. It will be necessary for him to have a wagon, as a great many of them have now, and as I believe all must eventually have.

Mr. LOBECK. To carry queen bees?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, so much has been stated about queen bees that I will take up that matter now. I will say to my friends that the law does not fix what can be carried or what may be carried in the mails any further than this: No dangerous material calculated to injure the mails may be carried, and all other matters relative to fixing what can be carried is a matter of executive order for the Post Office Department. It is said that to-day the number of articles that may be carried is restricted. I take it that when we have a parcel post on the rural routes, the rules regulating what may be carried as a parcel on the rural routes will not be the same as those fixing what may be carried in the mails generally throughout the United States, and I think this should be the case.

Many bills affecting the pay of the rural carriers have been introduced in Congress. I would not like to say how many, but there have been several hundred, perhaps, since I have been in Congress. Some of them are wise and well considered, and some are absolutely ridiculous in their form.

A bill will be introduced providing that on and after the 1st day of July—say 1910, or whatever the date may be—the pay of rural carriers shall be $1,100 or $1,200. These bills are introduced without taking into account the length of the routes, or whether the service is a six-day service or a three-day service, and so on. I want to say that this provision in the Post Office bill now to be considered is not contained in any other bill introduced in the House. It was offered in the Post Office Committee by way of amendment.

The rural carriers should be considered. They are a great body, 42,000 strong, able physically and mentally. They are honest, and of all the Government employees fewer of them are arrested for theft and dishonest practices than any other class or body of men in the Government service. [Applause.] I have intentionally passed over section 8 and will come to that later; section 8 relates to the parcel-post proposition reported by the committee.

Section 10 provides for experimental mail delivery at post offices of the second and third class that are not, under the law, at this time entitled to City Delivery Service. One hundred thousand dollars is appropriated for this experimental service. This experiment can only be extended to offices of the third class, i. e., where the salary of the postmaster is $1,000 and less than $2,000 a year, and to second-class offices where the receipts are at least $8,000 a year and less than $10,000.

Section 11 provides for the further organization of the postal savings-bank system, and I do not know that it is out of order for me to say I have never thought very much of this system; but it is the law of the land, and I believe in a legislator doing what is best in carrying out the law. [Applause.] This section gives to the Postmaster General, in part only, authority heretofore vested in three Cabinet officials. It has been found that it was often not easy to gather those three officials together to make and form rules and regulations, and so forth, which pertain particularly to the postal system and which the Postmaster General could make himself. I should judge that there would be no objection to this.

Section 12 amends the law so as to include persons in the Marine Corps among those eligible for appointment as naval mail clerks and assistants. Up to two or three years ago we had no regular mail service on the naval vessels of the United States. The Post Office Committee reported a proposition to the House, and Congress thought it wise to give postal facilities to the officers and men on United States naval vessels. It was found both expedient and economical that men engaged in the naval service, in one branch or another, should be employed as clerks discharging postal duties and functions. Now we go a step farther and provide that persons in the service mentioned may be made naval postal clerks.

I stated a moment ago that I would omit at that time a discussion of section 8 of the new legislation reported by the Post Office Committee. I think, as far as the public is concerned, of the 11 sections mentioned in the way of new legislation in the bill under consideration, section 8, in the eyes of millions of American people, is the most important of all these sections. For many years the people of the United States have been concerned, and to a greater or less extent have been demanding a parcel-post system. I remember when it was hardly mentioned.

The advocates of the parcel-post system may be divided into four classes: First, those who would limit its operation to rural-delivery routes. These, in my opinion, are in the minority, because whatever benefits that are to accrue to the public at large would be limited, should the parcel-post system stop at this point. Second, those who would have the general parcel-post system with a flat rate of 8 cents per pound. I think they are wrong. Third, those who would have a general parcel-post system under the zone principle, taking into consideration length of transportation, the number of miles, and weight of parcels so carried, the cost of receiving that parcel, of separating it, of transporting it, and delivering it. And why not, if we are to carry out the rule followed by railroad companies and express companies, which recognizes that it cost less to carry a package of merchandise through 2 miles than it does 2,000 miles. [Applause.] To the man who argues to the contrary on that proposition, I want to say that I have not time to discuss the question with him. [Laughter and applause.] This is what the railroad companies do, and it is what the express companies do. If I have time I want to come to the express companies, and if I do not I will state right now that I am not in favor of buying out the express companies. [Applause.]

I am not in favor of paying good money, and millions and millions of it, for what we do not need in our business. This country is going into the parcel-post business, but let us be sensible about it.

Fourth. Those who would take over and condemn the express companies under the provisions of the bill which is now in order as an amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill. This bill is commonly called the Lewis or Goeke bill.

The Lewis bill, which will be in order as an amendment when the Goeke bill is considered (the two bills are substantially the same), provides for buying out the express companies by the Government—business, property, contracts, and franchises—and this purpose is fairly represented by the title of the bill, which is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11371) providing for the condemnation and purchase of the franchises, and so forth, of the express companies of the United States, and the establishment of postal express.

To begin with, nine-tenths of the property of the express companies would be useless to the Government in conducting a parcel-post system, and I am of the opinion that we would not necessarily want the contracts existing between the railroads and the express companies. In addition to this, I would like to inquire why the Government should pay anything for the franchises and operating rights of an express company or any other company to do business in this country. I apprehend that when the condemnation proceedings contemplated by the bill was had that it would be seriously contended by the express companies that their corporate rights or franchises and contracts were the most valuable part of their business. I believe that this proposition has had no proper consideration anywhere. I want the American people to know what is proposed to be done under this bill, and I want to warn the friends of the parcel-post system who wish to give to the American people what they demand that this bill will not do it, and to tack it on as an amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill is to thwart and deny the demand of the American people for a parcel post. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINLEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Just for a question. The gentleman has classified the advocates of the parcel post into four different sets.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman will excuse me, I will come to the fifth class—those who are opposed to anything.

Mr. MURDOCK. I understood from the gentleman the first class are those who advocate a rural parcel post, the second class those who advocate a flat rate for the whole country, and the third class——

Mr. FINLEY. Are those who advocate the zone system.

Mr. MURDOCK. Are those advocating the zone system, and the fourth class are those who are for a parcel-post express.

Now, my question is this: Under which class does he place the provisions in the bill, namely, 11 pounds at 12 cents?

Mr. FINLEY. I do not place that provision under any of them. I want to repeat to the committee here what the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] knows. It was understood in the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and it is the opinion of the membership of that committee, that what we did in the way of increasing the limit of weight of packages that may go through the mail, from 4 pounds to 11 pounds, and reducing the charge from 16 cents to 12 cents a pound, was never intended to be an answer or any part of an answer to the demand of the American people for a parcel-post system. I will say further to the gentleman that which he also knows, and which every Member of this House knows, that that provision was placed in the Post Office appropriation bill by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in answer to the charge that the United States, being a member of the International Postal Union, permitted, under the provisions of the convention composing those 25 countries, parcels to come from Germany or France or England weighing 11 pounds, at 12 cents a pound, and under the law as it has been for some years past and as it is now, limited our own people to 4 pounds and made the rate 16 cents a pound. We wished to put an end to that criticism. No; it is not a parcel-post system at all.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I am sure you have given this matter a great deal of consideration. I would like to know what your solution of the parcel-post problem is?

Mr. FINLEY. I am coming to that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us get down to the milk in the coconut. Those people who stand for a flat rate, whether the distance is 2 miles or 2,000 miles, I submit, expect that the parcels they will have to send through the mail will be carried more than 2 miles.

I wish I had time to pay full compliment to the German people, the very greatest in many respects in all the world. They have a parcel post, and in it they recognize the zone principle. They recognize that, and they also monopolize the carriage of parcels up to 110 pounds. In no country in all the world, that has a full-fledged successful parcel-post system in operation, is there anything corresponding to the express companies' system in this country.

What the Post Office Committee has done is this: We provide for a commission to investigate this matter, and I would like to have pictures—and I believe I could sell them—of every man who is a Member of this House who will get up and state that he has made sufficient study of this question to be able to write, straight off the bat, a bill that would give to the American people what they should have in the way of a parcels post. Who can do it? Many such bills have been introduced here, the majority of them by Members who have made no study of the proposition. Threats have been made, but these threats I have promptly answered by saying that they would not influence me in doing my duty, as I conceive it, in respect to this or any other bill. Bills have been introduced in the House which bear the earmarks of the department stores of the country.

Mr. Chairman, the Post Office Committee of the House of Representatives have gone to work honestly and sincerely. They mean to do something, and when you go to consider and frame a parcel-post law, the very first question that will confront anybody who has that job on his hands is the question of transportation.

Now, as to what would be the proper rate, I do not know. There is no man in the American Congress who can answer that question accurately, and to the satisfaction of any 500 men in this country, without fear of reasonable contradiction.

We have provided this commission; the commission can not live long. There are to be six men on it, three to be appointed by the Speaker of this House and three by the Vice President of the United States. The amount of the appropriation is comparatively small. I had something to do with that, and my position is this: That if you make an appropriation for a commission very large, that commission will do business until the money is exhausted. They act on the principle that some people believe that the vilest sinner if he returns it is just before the light goes out. [Laughter.] So only $25,000 is provided to enable this commission to obtain the proper information. That commission should do its work in six months at least; maybe in less time.

Now, I ask the House, Are you going to work here and write a parcel-post law? Are you going to work and buy out the express companies in this country, without knowing what you are doing? I am against the express companies; I think that of all the public servants in this country, if there be one class more than another that deserves condemnation, it is the express companies. I am against them, and I wish to end the present conditions as soon as possible. [Applause.]

Now, my friends, I have stated the position of the committee. Let us consider a few facts. I have not had time, and no one else has had time, to pass upon and intelligently decide all of these questions. You must remember that the Democratic majority of the present Post Office Committee has been in power only since the 4th day of March, 1911. You know that at the extraordinary session we considered and were permitted to consider only tariff legislation. No general legislation was considered then, so that practically this is the first session of this Congress. A Democratic House? Yes. One that means to do business? Yes; one that means to serve the people the very best we know how. We are trying to do it. This is the first opportunity we have had to do anything, and we have made a beginning. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, my friends, I want to say this: When a commission gets ready to consider this great question they must take into consideration the question of transportation, and they will find that in a majority of countries of the world, especially in European countries and in Australia, where they have a complete parcel-post system, the Governments own, to a very large extent, the railroads. In this country the Government owns no railroads except a little bobtail connection between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans down on the Isthmus of Panama. Even there it has been charged they permit some one—I have forgotten who—to hold one share of stock and, I am told, in the past to decide as to what shall be charged, and so forth. We do not own a railroad in the United States. Now, I believe and have long thought that possibly, and perhaps probably, great reforms and great economies can be effected in the postal service by the Government owning its own mail cars. I have long believed that. You can build to-day mail cars at a cost of anywhere from $6,000 or $8,000 to $16,000 apiece, and we have now more than 1,000 full railway post-office, privately owned cars used in carrying the mail.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. FINLEY. Just in one moment. When the parcel post is in operation in this country probably that number may be increased to 3,000 or 4,000. Now, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAUGEN. Can the gentleman give any reason why the Government can furnish cars to the railroad companies and the express companies get lower rates from the railroad companies without owning the cars?

Mr. FINLEY. I will come to that in a moment. When the Government owns these cars, costing from $8,000 to $16,000 a car, and in many cases less than that, the charges can be reduced. I have gone to work to get some figures on that subject. When a railroad hauls a privately owned car the rates range from 12 cents a mile to 6 cents a mile. They charge from 12 cents a mile for the heaviest cars down to 6 cents a mile, and then charge a rate for passengers, fixing the number of passengers that shall be carried or the amount of money that shall be paid, and, in the case of freight, the amount of freight charges is additional. But they haul these cars at that rate whether they are filled with freight or are empty.

Now, if you take cases, where, for instance, the meat companies ship their meats over the railroads in their own refrigerator cars, the railroad companies charge the shipper or the consignee the freight on what is contained in the car, and then allow the owner of the car 1 cent a mile as pay for his car. Now, why can not the Government do as well as that? If it can do as well as that——

Mr. HAUGEN. I will answer the gentleman. My contention is that the railroad company should furnish cars free of charge to the Government, the same as it does to the express companies. I will ask the gentleman this question: Does he believe in comparing the rate paid by the Government, to the rate paid by the express companies to the railroads?

Mr. FINLEY. No. I believe the railroad companies and the express companies have an understanding by which I believe they get the best of the public.

Mr. HAUGEN. Does the gentleman contend that the rate paid by the express companies to the railroad is too low?

Mr. FINLEY. No. My contention is that the rate paid by the public to the express company is too high.

Mr. HAUGEN. What rate?

Mr. FINLEY. The rate paid by the public. I want to say to the gentleman that I have not fully investigated the question as to whether 45 or 50 per cent is a proper division of express charges between the express companies and the railroad companies.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman will examine the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission he will find that the rate paid by the express companies is but 75 cents a hundred, while this Government pays more than $4 a hundred for carrying mail matter.

Mr. FINLEY. I have examined that report, and I will come to that. Now, take the rate from Washington, D. C., to Charlotte, N. C. The distance is 381 miles, and that is supposed to be about the average distance that express is hauled. I do not give the exact figures. The authorities differ. Some say one mileage and other authorities say another mileage; but that is approximate. Now, at 10 cents per mile for the car it would be $38.10. That would be the cost of hauling a mail car from Washington to Charlotte. At 8 cents it would be $30.48 for the car. On carload lots it is said that about 5,000 pounds is the quantity of mail hauled in a car. I take it that in hauling parcels through the mails the weight would be largely increased; but at 5,000 pounds from Washington to Charlotte it would be $48.50; 10,000 pounds would be $97; 15,000 pounds would be $145.50; 20,000 pounds would be $194; and 24,000 pounds would be $232.80. That is for first-class freight in carload lots. It does not mean grain or bacon or hay or anything of that sort, but it means first-class freight, and it means a class of freight that would compare with parcels carried through the mails.

Those are the figures that are charged by the railroad companies at present. All of these matters will have to be considered by the American Congress under conditions existing in this country; the Government owning no railroads, the Government having to provide for transportation, and to do it in a sensible, intelligent way, fair alike to the public and to the Government. The man who would have the United States Government carry parcels through the mails at a cost to the taxpayers of this country is dishonest. A parcel of merchandise going through the mails is merchandise, the same as if it were shipped by freight in the ordinary way over a railroad.

Now, let us look for a moment into what is done in a number of the principal countries of the world that have a domestic parcel-post system in operation. Great Britain has the following weight and flat rate of charges:

For the first pound, 6 cents, and up to 11 pounds, 22 cents.

Great Britain is a comparatively small country, having an area of 121,371 square miles, a population of 41,961,000, with 23,205 miles of railroad. The railroads are owned by private individuals or corporations. In Great Britain the Government has an arrangement with the railroads for carrying parcels very similar to that held by the express companies in the United States; that is, the Government pays to the railroads, as I recollect, something like from 45 to 50 per cent of the rates charged for transporting a parcel. The average haul in Great Brtain would not be half as long as the average haul in the United States. However, it may be stated that after a parcel has been received at the post office and transferred to a mail car the cost for carrying the same for the first hundred miles or less would be a great deal more than to carry the package the second hundred or even 200 miles more.

Australia is a very large country in area, with a small population—only 3,772,000. The Government owns 14,189 miles of railroads. Private-owned railroads only amount to 1,068 miles. Australia has a domestic parcel-post system of 12 cents for the first pound, and 6 cents for each additional pound. These rates are entirely too high for a proper system in the United States, for the reason that the population per square mile in Australia is only 1.27 persons, and in the United States the population per square mile is 26.56 persons.

Belgium is an exceedingly small country of only 11,373 square miles, with a population of about 6,700,000, the population per square mile being 588 persons. Belgium has a domestic parcel post. The rates charged are for a package 11 pounds and under, or, to be exact, 11.025 pounds and under; 6 cents for carrying parcels to the railroad stations when such services are performed. And for first class, 16 cents, and second class, 10 cents. This is a flat rate, and I believe about the lowest in the world. It must be borne in mind, however, that the density of population is 22 times greater in Belgium than it is in the United States. The table of rates for Belgium is as follows:

In addition to a charge of 6 cents per parcel for conveyance to the railway station, when such service is performed, parcels are charged at the following rates according as their transportation and delivery is effected under the conditions applicable to the first or the second-class service, viz:

Maximum weight in pounds.	First class.	Second class.
	Cents.	Cents.
22.050	20	12
110.25	60	20

The first-class service offers quicker transportation and better conditions of delivery, transportation being effected by the first passenger train available for that purpose.

France is an old and highly developed country in all of its resources, with an area of 207,054 square miles, a population of about 40,000,000, and about 195 persons to the square mile, with 25,047 miles of private-owned and 5,834 of Government-owned railroads, and has a flat-rate parcel-post system in operation, with weight and rates as follows: Up to a little less than 6⅝ pounds, or, to be exact, 6.615 pounds, 10 cents; exceeding this weight, but not exceeding 11.025 pounds, 14 cents; exceeding this weight, but not exceeding 22.05 pounds, 23 cents.

The German Empire has an area in square miles of 208,830, with a population of more than sixty millions, with a density of population per square mile of approximately 300 persons. Germany has 1,318 private owned and 32,885 Government-owned miles of railroads. Practically speaking, the German Government owns all of the railroads. Germany has a parcel-post system, operated under the zone, or distance, basis. Parcels in the German Empire are carried as follows:

1. Up to 11.025 pounds:
   (a) Not exceeding 10 geographic miles, 6.25 cents.
   (b) Longer distances, 12.50 cents.
2. Exceeding 11.025 pounds:
   (a) First 11.025 pounds, the same rates as under "1."
   (b) Per additional 2.205 pounds or fractional part thereof—
   First zone (up to 10 geographic miles), 1.25 cents.
   Second zone (up to 20 geographic miles), 2.50 cents.
   Third zone (up to 50 geographic miles), 5 cents.
   Fourth zone (up to 100 geographic miles), 7.50 cents.
   Fifth zone (up to 150 geographic miles), 10 cents.
   Sixth zone (above 150 geographic miles), 12.50 cents.

It appears conclusively from the rates I submit that in each of the countries mentioned, the rates or charges for carrying parcels differ from the rates in other countries. The reason for this must be plain to everyone who will carefully consider the question. What is a proper charge for carrying a parcel through the mails or by the government can not be the same in all countries, for the reason that conditions are different. Thus we see that in England, with a comparatively small area, large population, private-owned railroads, and comparatively short hauls, the Government charges 6 cents for the first pound, and up to 11 pounds only 22 cents.

In Australia, where practically all the railroads are owned by the Government, the country nearly as large in area as the United States, with a population per mile very small, the rate is 12 cents for the first pound and 6 cents for each additional pound. In Belgium, with an exceedingly small area of territory, the greatest density of population, the railroads principally owned and operated by the Government, the rates for carrying parcels through the mails are very low as compared with other countries.

In Austria, with an area of square miles a little less than that of France, and a population about five millions greater, and the same density of population, with the Government owning or operating four-fifths of the miles of railroads in the country, the rate of charges for carrying parcels or packages through the mails for any distance above 20 miles is practically prohibitive. The table of Austrian rates is as follows:

1. Up to 11.025 pounds:
   (a) Within the zone of 10 geographic miles, 6 cents;
   (b) Beyond that zone of 10 geographic miles, 12 cents.
2. Above 11.025 pounds:
   (a) For the first 11.025 pounds the same rates as under "1;"
   (b) Per additional pound or fraction of a pound:
   First zone (up to 10 geographic miles), 5⅜ cents.
   Second zone (up to 20 geographic miles), 10⅜ cents.
   Third zone (up to 50 geographic miles), 20⅜ cents.
   Fourth zone (up to 100 geographic miles), 31⅛ cents.
   Fifth zone (up to 150 geographic miles), 41⅜ cents.
   Sixth zone (above 150 geographic miles), 52 cents.

France has a flat rate parcel-post system in operation up to 6.615 pounds, 10 cents; exceeding this weight, but not exceeding 11 pounds and a small fraction, or to be exact, 11.025 pounds, 14 cents; exceeding 11 pounds but not exceeding 22.05 pounds. 23 cents.

We can see at a glance the difference between France and Austria, Germany and Belgium, England and Australia. And it is worth while to consider the variation in rates in Germany, France, and Austria, countries having the same area, France and Austria the same density of population, with Germany a population about 50 per cent greater per square mile than France and Austria; the rate in Germany, with Government-owned railroads, very liberal; that of France, with private-owned railroads, entirely liberal; and the rate in Austria, with Government-owned or Government owned and operated railroads, practically prohibitive.

The following statement shows the rate of cost to the United States for railroad transportation of the mails per pound under the existing law for the fiscal year of 1908, based on a special weighing of the mails by the Post Office Department, compared with the amount paid railroads for transporting the mails for that fiscal year.

Cost per pound for transporting first-class mail matter by railroad transportation, 7.062 cents; mail and equipment combined, 1.9666 cents per pound; second-class mail matter, including mail for Canada, 2.9712 cents per pound; total cost of second-class mail matter, equipment, and empty equipment, 2.6477 cents per pound; third-class mail matter, 4.6758 cents per pound; total cost of transporting third-class mail matter, together with equipment and empty equipment, 2.251 cents per pound; fourth-class mail matter, 3.3967 cents per pound; total cost of transporting third-class mail matter, with equipment and empty equipment, 3.0266 cents per pound. Total average cost per pound for the transportation of all classes of mail matter by railroad, not including equipment, 3.7919; total average cost of transporting all classes of mail matter by railroad, including equipment and empty equipment, 2.4699 cents per pound.

I would like to know how many of the authors of parcels post and postal express bills have taken in consideration this question.

Now, my friends, I would like, on a great question like this, to be able to answer every Member fully. I would like to be able to submit to all interruptions, but that is impossible in the limited time I have.

I want to say this in closing: We have by law, passed within the last few years by Congress, clothed the Interstate Commerce Commission with the power to regulate express charges. How much progress has been made along that line? I do not propose to indict the whole American people.

I am here to serve them, and when they demand a parcel-post system I am sure that they expect me to answer their demand in an honest, intelligent, and practicable way. The people I represent do not expect that I will vote for a bill that will give to any person advantages and benefits in the way of flat charges for transportation on what they have to sell, at the expense of the American taxpayers; and when a bill is proposed—and a number of bills have been proposed—that fixes the same rate for sending merchandise through the mails 3,000 miles as for 3 miles, no one can argue to me that the bill is a proper one or that such a measure will give relief to the American people from the unjust and exorbitant charges of the express companies in this country. If the charge fixed in such a bill is the correct charge for carrying merchandise 3,000 miles and will equal the expense to the Government for performing this service, it follows that this charge would be unreasonable and a prohibitive charge for carrying the same package 30 miles, 100 miles, or 500 miles; and the proposition simply means to give to a few people special privileges and advantages at the expense of the taxpayers of the country. Let us be frank in discussing this question. As has been stated, the Interstate Commerce Commission is clothed with the power to regulate the rate charged by the express companies. How much effort has been made along this line to secure relief by any community, association, or individual? I regret to say, very little. The reason for this is evident. No one person can afford to go to the trouble and expense of hiring lawyers and having extensive hearings before the Interstate Commerce Commission in order to secure lower rates from the express companies.

It is, however, to the credit of the Interstate Commerce Commission that they are taking up this question of their own motion and are making investigations. They are doing what they should do, and when Congress passes the provision in the bill under consideration providing that a committee of Congress shall investigate this question and report by December next, all the necessary information to guide Congress in framing a proper parcel-post system for the United States, we will have the benefit of the information in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I believe that the Post Office Committee have done the very best they could do under the circumstances. I believe that they have done faithful work, that they have brought to the House the very best legislation they could bring at this time. The Members of this House have certainly made no more study of this question than the committee has, and I do not think it would be at the expense of modesty to say that a great majority of the Members of the House have not made as much study as the committee. Whether any of them has done so I will not attempt to say. Now, let us do the right thing, and let us do it in the right way. We can not settle this great question in a minute. It may be argued that Congress has had years in which to study this question. That Congress has not heretofore taken hold of the parcel-post question in a way promising legislation is undeniably true, but I call the attention of the House and of the country to the fact that for 16 years prior to this Congress the Democrats have been in a minority in the House and have had no opportunity to do anything. The Republican Party was in power and was responsible for legislation. Now that the Democrats have control of the House and are responsible for such legislation as passes the House, and this question is up for consideration, the American people do not demand of the membership of the House hasty, ill-considered, ill-advised, and wasteful legislation. We do not need to buy out the express companies. We do not need to obey the orders of the department stores in the cities and pass a bill that will give to them and all others who are interested in long-distance shipments the same rate for carrying a parcel 5 miles as is charged for carrying a parcel 500 or 3,000 miles.

I represent every class and condition of people in my district, and I am unwilling to vote for a bill that will give to one class—and that a small class—advantages at the expense and to the injury of all others. When we have a parcel-post system in this country, it will be on the basis of carrying merchandise through the mails as freight. The service performed by the Government will be paid for, at least, to the extent of the cost of such service to the Government. The weight of the parcel carried and the distance the same is carried will regulate the rate of charges fixed by law for the performance of this service. If a person wishes to go from Washington to Alexandria, Va., a distance of 8 miles on the railroad, he can go for 25 cents or less. On the other hand, if he wishes to go from Washington to San Francisco, the charges are anywhere from $60 to $75. So that, I repeat, a parcel-post system in this country in the matter of rates or charges should be based on distance and cost of service performed by the Government. In addition to what I have said, I may add that the Government does not need to buy out the express companies. This has not been done in any country where there is a full-fledged parcel-post system in operation, and it has been stated in no such country is there any express-company service corresponding with the express-company service in the United States.

One other matter that must be considered in framing a parcel-post bill: Once the system is in operation the service will be performed by the persons in the postal service of the Government. The salaries paid by the Government to its postal employees are a great deal higher than the salaries paid by the express companies. All of these questions are matters to be considered, and no one will be injured by waiting until the 1st of December, when Congress can secure and have before it the necessary information to guide Congress in framing whatever parcel-post legislation that is to be passed. Now, there are other propositions not contained in the Post Office appropriation bill as the same was reported to the House that will be in order by way of amendment later on. I regret, however, that I have not time to discuss these questions now. When the bill is taken up under the five-minute rule I hope to have something further to say on the various questions involved in the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for the kind and considerate attention they have given me. I have studied this question, and I believe that the Post Office Committee have done faithful and efficient work. We submit the product of our labors to you, in the confidence that you will do for the American people what is right in the premises. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD].

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, the Post Office appropriation bill carries the largest aggregate of proposed expenditure which is presented to Congress in any one bill. The estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, presented to Congress at the beginning of this session, show as necessary to meet the legitimate expenses of the Government for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1912, the sum of $745,834,563.55, and for the expense of the postal service $261,180,063, which is about one-fourth of the total estimate for the expenses of every branch of the public service, including the sinking fund, which is provided for the purpose of paying the interest on the public debt.

The estimates for the postal service were carefully made, and the Post Office Committee, after inquiry as to the needs of the service, have recommended in the pending bill $259,827,749, a decrease in amount from the final estimates of the department of $1,352,314. The average annual increase in postal expenditure for the last 15 years has been over $11,000,000. The appropriation made in 1911 was $243,907,020; the appropriation for 1912—that is, for the current year—is $258,352,713, an increase of $14,445,693. If there had been the same increase in the current bill, it would have carried about $272,798,406, or $14,445,693 more than is proposed in this bill.

I mention this to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this bill is in line with the policy of Democratic retrenchment, and that there will be a saving not equaled in the Post Office Department since the last Democratic House and in an amount exceeding $10,000,000.

A few recommendations have been made which increase the estimates originally submitted. Some of these are amounts of increase made necessary on account of the change in the system of promotion of railway mail clerks by automatic scale; and the sum of $3,000,000 to rural carriers because of the proposed increase in their salaries on account of the extra labor which it will be necessary for them to perform by reason of the experimental parcel-post system, which is provided for in this bill; and $400,000 which is necessary to meet the expenses of the postal savings bank system, which thus far has been a source of great loss to the Government instead of producing revenue.

This bill makes a reduction from the estimates submitted in numerous other items, because in the judgment of the committee efficient service can be rendered by the department without so much of expenditure.

The service first appropriated for in this bill is the inspection service. There are at present 390 inspectors authorized, who receive $704,450 for their services. This bill does not change their estimates, and the appropriation proposed carries the same amount as their estimates.

This bill makes a proviso that not more than 30 of the inspectors may be placed under the supervision of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General for the purpose of inspecting existing and proposed rural routes. At the present time the inspection force is mainly employed in fraud-order cases, inquiry into the affairs of newspapers, periodicals, and magazines to ascertain whether these publications meet the requirements of the Post Office Department with reference to admission to the second-class rate, and other matters which, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, are more important than the investigation of the rural service.

It is the opinion of the Post Office Committee, based upon the hearings on the pending bill, that rural-route investigations have been neglected for what the department seems to consider more important matters. The purpose of this proviso is to direct the department to inspect pending applications for rural service and to give to this branch of the Post Office Department the attention its importance demands. For several years large appropriations for the extension of the rural service have been made. Last year, in order to show a surplus in postal affairs, or because of the indifference of the Postmaster General, or because of the opinion that other investigations were more important than the extension of the rural service, several hundred proposed rural routes were never investigated. One million eight hundred and eight thousand seven hundred and seventy dollars and thirty cents of that which was appropriated was not expended. If the Postmaster General had carried out the provisions of the law and extended the rural service, as was expected by Congress, this money would have been expended. The failure of the department to use the appropriation provided prevented the extension of rural service and allowed petitions to lie without consideration where rural service should properly have been established.

There is complaint about the inspection service. Some of it may be well founded, while much of it is not. The inspectors wield a wonderful power. A corrupt inspector can do much to injure. The methods of many inspectors are questionable. The license given them to open and withhold mail, to pursue detective methods, may in the hands of unscrupulous men prove a curse to the proper administration of the law. But from my knowledge of inspectors and their achievements my judgment is that these employees are on the whole a superior class of men and can be relied upon to do the right thing as they see it. If I am not misled, much of that which is condemned in the inspector results from the command of his superior officers. They are charged in some instances with pernicious political activity, with oppression in office, and, in some cases, are doubtless guilty. But as a rule the inspector is discreet in his political affiliations and humanitarian in his official relations.

In post offices of the second and third class there have been complaints from time to time that the assistant postmasters are not paid that which is due them. The law allows an assistant postmaster not more than one-half of the salary of the postmaster. The postmasters themselves construe this to mean that the salary of the assistant should be one-half the salary of the postmaster.

In the smaller offices, however, this full allowance is not made, and in many instances the clerks in the post offices receive greater compensation than the assistant postmasters in the same offices. For example, the postmaster at Unionville, Mo., receives $2,000 per year. The assistant postmaster is entitled to $1,000, or one-half of the salary of the postmaster, but he receives only $900, while the clerks under him receive $1,000 each.

The Post Office Department claims that this condition is due to the fact that Congress has not made sufficient appropriation to make full payment, and it has been necessary to scale the wages down. To avoid this complaint and injustice there has been added to the appropriation for assistant postmasters what is deemed to be a sufficient sum to make their salary one-half that of the postmaster's salary.

It is true that the estimated appropriation for this branch of the service is the same as that which is recommended by this committee, but it is believed that the number of assistants may not be so numerous as suggested in the estimates. The estimate of the Postmaster General shows it will require $185,000 to meet this changed condition and recommends $200,000 more than was appropriated for the current year. But a careful inquiry as to the expenditures heretofore made leads the committee to believe that the $3,000,000 which is here appropriated will meet this increased compensation and permit the payment to every assistant postmaster of the full amount of his salary.

There has been each year, for a number of years, a contest about the pay of letter carriers in first and second class offices, as to whether, under the automatic advancement that is made from lower to higher offices the $100 per year, where the employee has a good record of efficiency, should stop at the fifth grade in first-class offices and the fourth grade in second-class offices, or at a salary of $1,100 in first-class offices and $1,000 in second-class offices, or whether the automatic promotion should be carried to the sixth grade in first-class offices, with a salary of $1,200, and to the fifth grade in second-class offices, with a salary of $1,100. Some of those in the lower grades are not eligible to promotion to these higher grades on account of inefficiency, and some are promoted after the beginning of the year, so that full salary is not required. To meet this condition and to promote all those who may be properly promoted this bill provides for the promotion of 75 per cent of those in these several grades to the higher grades. Heretofore the bills have provided for the advancement of 50 per cent. This increase in promotions to 75 per cent of those in these grades, we think, will meet the demands of the clerks and satisfy this class of employees.

There are several sections of proposed new law in the pending bill, but I shall call attention to but a few of them. One of the most important of these, in my opinion, is the experimental mail delivery, provided for in section 10, for towns and villages having post offices of the second and third class, but which are not now entitled to Free Delivery Service. Under existing law a city with a population of 10,000 or with a post office whose aggregate receipts within 12 months amount to more than $10,000 is entitled to free delivery, and, as you are aware, outside of the incorporated towns or cities rural delivery is provided in all parts of the United States, excepting in the thinly populated districts, but in those towns which do not measure up to the requirements of the law with reference to city delivery the individual must obtain his mail at the post office. On any principle of equity or fair dealing among the citizens of the country it would seem that there could be no excuse for this favoritism. The citizens of a town of 5,000 inhabitants, or where the receipts are only $8,000, should certainly be entitled to as much consideration at the hands of the Government as the person who is so fortunate as to meet the existing law by living outside of the corporation and thus obtain his mail through a rural delivery carrier.

It is difficult to explain why a man living one-half mile from the post office in a town of 3,000 inhabitants is not as much entitled to receive his mail at his door as the man who happens to live on a farm 10 miles from town.

The objection that is raised to the extension is that it will be too expensive. I remember well, in 1897, when $150,000 was asked for experimental rural mail service. This was objected to on the ground that it was only a beginning of a great annual expenditure which would probably necessitate in the near future the annual expenditure of $40,000,000. The experiment was made, however, and the prophecy has been fulfilled.

This bill carries for rural mail transportation $43,375,000, but where is the taxpayer who is so little interested in the progress of his country as to wish this splendid service discontinued. In my opinion it is the most popular service that was ever established, and is more appreciated by the people of the United States than anything that comes to them at the hands of the Government.

The appropriation for experimental delivery of mail for second and third class offices carried in this bill is $100,000. I think it can be safely predicted that if the appropriation is made it will never be less hereafter, but in a few years the millions of people living in the smaller towns and cities will have their mail delivered to them as their more fortunate brethren in the large city and the rural districts do now. I believe this plan will be worked out, and I welcome the idea.

It was thought the appropriation of $150,000 in 1897 would result, as the appropriations for the service increased, in a greater deficiency in the postal account, and yet the records show that the aggregate deficiency on account of the Post Office Department in the years 1897, 1898, and 1899 was $3,500,000 more than in the years 1909, 1910, and 1911, after the service had been fully established and the extraordinary expense incurred on account of installing it. It may happen that when the $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 which will be needed annually to perfect the delivery service in second and third class offices shall have been expended there may be a paying service, and the deficiency which from year to year has been borne on account of it may ultimately be converted into a surplus.

There is more solicitation from the country at large, perhaps, over the parcel-post question than over any other subject that affects the postal department. There are strong influences at work on both sides of the general subject. One side insists upon a general parcel post, while the other protests against the slightest advance toward it. If a Member of Congress listens to the story of exorbitant charges by express companies, the present prohibitive postal rate and extortion by the retail merchant, and the convenience and profit that would come to the people by its establishment, and especially the blessing it would be to the people to be permitted to secure their goods from the great department stores at nominal transportation rates. he must conclude that by all means such a system should be established. Then, on the other hand, he hears the plaintive cry of the retail merchant and the story of the ruin which must come to his business; listens to his insistence on preventing a paternalistic idea to destroy his business and his plea of the necessity of protecting the home from the encroachment of outsiders; and when the Congressman is told in good faith that if parcel post is established it will cause the local merchant to cease his business and have the effect of ruining all the smaller towns and cities of the country, one wonders why such legislation should be considered and why one class of people should demand a system of transportation which would result in such serious injury to another class.

The pending measure, in my judgment, does not solve the problem of parcel post. It in no way settles the question. I believe in considering the question fairly and honestly in the interest of the whole people. I believe it is proper to state what the parcel-post people want, and I believe every Member of Congress, as well as the people generally, should understand that no bill pending to-day asking for a reduction of postal rates on fourth-class matter is, in fact, a general parcel-post bill, as contemplated by the people of the country.

Those demanding a parcel post are anxious to have a cheap means of transportation of small packages of merchandise and small packages of farm, dairy, and horticultural products. so that these may be transmitted through the mail at nominal cost, and none of the bills pending will produce that result.

As I understand it, from those who advocate most strenuously a parcel-post system, they desire that the fourth-class rate—which is the rate under which parcels are carried—shall be 5 cents for the first pound of weight, and that each additional pound up to 11 pounds shall pay 2 cents. In other words, that an 11-pound package shall be carried for 25 cents.

The Sulzer bill, which is now advocated by many, is only a step in that direction and is intended to be only such a step, and the men who advocate it should well understand that they will be asked, as soon as such a proposition becomes a law, to lower the rate to correspond to that which I have outlined, because no farmer can afford to pay 8 cents per pound for the delivery of products of his farm to his market, nor will he be satisfied to pay 8 cents per pound, as provided for in that bill, for any package he may receive from the department stores.

Another thing should be distinctly understood. The farmer who wishes the parcel post in order that he may obtain merchandise wishes to patronize the department store, and when he patronizes the department store his business is necessarily taken from the local merchant and the business of the local merchant is affected to that extent. If the farmer by reason of a nominal postal rate is enabled to make his purchases at a profit to himself from the department house he will deal with the department store, and if he trades with the department houses of the cities rather than with his local merchant the result will be that the local merchant must lose his profits on such business.

On the other hand, the farmer and laborer in the town or city claims he has a perfect right to trade where he can buy his goods cheapest, and argues he can buy goods cheaper from the great department store than from the retail merchant of the town in which he lives. He insists that the Government should provide a parcel-post system similar to that which is in use in other countries for the transportation of such goods as he may purchase at the department stores. He states that the retail merchant charges an exorbitant price; asserts that he has no desire to destroy his business or injure the small town, but, on the contrary, wishes to see his local community succeed; that he prides himself on the town he calls his own, but states that the local merchant to-day is required to pay the expense of the middle man from the profits which accrue to him, and this expense of the middle man to reach the retail merchant must be borne by the farmer. The farmer believes if he can obtain his goods in small quantities where he can buy them cheapest he can avoid the expense which is added to the cost of the goods he purchases from the retail merchant, namely, the profit to the middle man which must be included in the profit of the merchant. The farmer contends that if the local merchant will be satisfied with a reasonable profit, buy his goods directly from the factory, and sell them at the same price as the great department stores he will succeed and the farmer continue to trade with him. In other words, the farmer to-day contends that the retail merchant is not treating him fairly, and because of this the farmer should be placed by the Government in a position where he can protect himself.

These are the two contending ideas, and it is a serious proposition to determine what should be done to meet these conditions. There may be something of merit in the contention of either side; each has elements of truth in it; but one of the serious questions that presents itself is the spirit which is frequently manifested by the individual that a Member of Congress must become partisan for one side or the other of this contention.

As I stated a few moments ago, the pending bill does not settle this question. The proposed reduction of the rate from 16 cents to 12 cents and increase in the number of pounds that may be carried from 4 pounds to 11 will to some extent encourage the transit of parcels by mail; but, in my judgment, it will affect it but little, because even a 12-cent rate will be prohibitive to a great extent, especially as to packages that exceed 4 pounds in weight, and in most instances packages could be carried cheaper by express than by mail unless the distance should be great. It may have the effect of causing the express companies to slightly reduce their rates; and if so, it will be beneficial to the American people to that extent. The reason that especially controls in the proposed reduction of rate is that the rate is international, and there is not, nor can there be, any excuse for charging more for sending a parcel from one town to another in this country than for sending the same package to countries in Europe. The rate charged is the rate that would be paid if the package were sent to most any foreign country.

The second proposition in the bill is for an experimental parcel post. It seems to me this should be beneficial both to the farmer and the local merchant, and the surprising thing is that it is objected to by both the local merchant and the farmer. The farmer objects to it because he wants a general system, and this does not provide for it; the retail merchant objects to it because he feels it is a step toward a general parcel post, and if a rural parcel post is established there can be no plausible excuse for preventing its extension to the whole country. Hence the Post Office Committee, in order that the facts may be ascertained as to the benefit that may be derived and to determine whether it will be really beneficial or not, have provided for its establishment in an experimental way; so the system as proposed will go into effect on the 1st day of July; it will continue only two years unless the law is changed. The rate proposed is that desired by the advocates of a general parcel post to be applied to the whole country.

The third proposition of the bill provides for a commission of three Members of the House and three of the Senate to carefully investgate the subject of parcel post and report back to Congress their findings and recommendations, and is indorsed by many on both sides of the question.

Personally I am not much inclined to commissions. I believe that in the past commissions have not proven of much advantage, but the parcel-post question, being one about which there is so little practical information in the United States and it being so difficult to adapt foreign systems to our conditions and to work out an American system based on American conditions, it seems advisable to give the matter special study and to obtain as nearly as possible expert information on the subject, which can only be done through a commission; hence the committee has recommended that one be appointed.

It can be properly stated, I think, that a reduction of the general rate and increase in size of package is necessary to meet the international condition and will injure no one and be of some benefit to the people in general.

The proposed experimental parcel post should prove of mutual benefit to the farmer and the retail merchant of the respective towns and cities, in which case it may be decided that the system should be continued in the interest of the people generally. If the proposition for a commission be adopted, it is hoped that information may be gathered on the subject which will enable Congress to determine what should be done in the matter of the establishment of a general parcel post and what sort of system should be inaugurated and what method adopted to carry it out, if it be deemed wise to establish it.

It may be proper to state before leaving this question that the Post Office Department estimates that it costs on an average 12 cents per pound to handle fourth-class matter of parcel merchandise. If this be true, then the provision in this bill reducing the rate to 12 cents is as far as the Government can go without loss, as if the rate were reduced to a nominal sum there would then be an enormous loss if the Government estimate be correct. My impression is that the people want a system devised which will not entail loss to the Government. If the Government is to become a competitor of the express companies in the matter of carrying packages under 11 pounds, then it should not give its competitors the advantage of the short haul or profitable business and be compelled to carry the long-distance packages at great loss. Some system of charge with reference to distance should be devised so that within certain limitations of distance the rate shall be a given sum, while for greater distances it shall be a greater sum. There is no reason from a commercial standpoint why the Government should receive the same amount for carrying a package from one town to another, a distance, say, of 5 miles, as for carrying the same package from one side of the continent to the other, and one of the things to be worked out by the commission, should it be appointed, is a system of rates which would be properly applicable everywhere.

In other words, it would be expected that such commission should carefully consider this zone-rate charge and recommend whether it would be wise to continue the present system of uniform charge or whether there should be different charges for different distances. It would be necessary for the commission to investigate express rates and determine what, if anything, should be done in the matter of legislation as to express companies. There is a rapidly growing disposition to take over express companies and have the railroad companies do the heavy part of that which is now done by the express companies, the smaller packages to be handled by the Government through the Postal Department. This is a great question and is worthy of the most careful consideration. There are many who believe that the express companies are parasites on the transportation system; that, in fact, express companies have no legitimate place amongst business enterprises. The work of express companies is so nearly identified with the work of carrying parcels by the Government that there should be complete knowledge with reference to these companies, their charges, and their right to exist. Bills are pending at present before committees which, if enacted into law, will either confiscate express companies, purchase their business, or compel them to cease their operations at a specified time.

Much favorable comment has been given to the various phases of this proposed legislation, and there are many who are in favor of in some way forcing the express companies out of existence.

Another question which the commission would be expected to ascertain is the cost of carriage of fourth-class mail and what the effect would be if a nominal rate were fixed. There are numerous questions which the commission might properly investigate. The truth is that we have but little accurate and definite information on this important subject. There is a disposition on the part of the advocates of a parcel-post system to compare our system with that of the smaller countries of Europe. Our system is in many respects different from any of those systems. There is a different relation in this country between the Government and the corporations, a different ownership in some instances, and it is necessary to consider all these things in the determination of what should be the American system. This is a country of long distances. In most of the European countries packages are carried only short distances. Everything in the United States is carried on on a costly basis; in the countries of Europe on an economical basis; and to work out a system of our own that will meet the conditions in this country is not an easy task. The proposed commission could do much to enlighten the public on these important questions.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY].

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, 42 years ago there was born in an obscure mining town in Pennsylvania one of the present Members of this House. He had but poor opportunities for education, and at the age of 9 years he commenced work in the coal mines. He became a member of the coal miners' union. He attended Sunday school and there learned to read. He studied law while still a laborer in the mines. At the age of 23 he was admitted to the bar and has since practiced his profession, taking an active interest in the public welfare. At the last election he was elected a Member of this body. I refer to the original draftsman of the parcel-express bill, the gentleman from Maryland, DAVID JOHN LEWIS.

For years a considerable portion of the people of this country, if not, indeed, a great majority, have been demanding a parcel post as a means of meeting and securing relief from the exorbitant rates of the express companies. Objections of various kinds were raised. It was argued that a parcel post would injure the regular mail business. It was said that it would overload the postal employees. Some contended that it would create a postal deficit that the Treasury could ill afford to stand.

At this juncture the new Member from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS], the coal miner, introduced in this House a comprehensive bill providing for a parcel express to be operated by the Government in connection with the Post Office Department. He put in the RECORD an exhaustive treatise exemplifying his plan. This was printed in pamphlet form and sent to each Member of this House. It appealed to Members as being a logical and businesslike solution of the parcel-post question. Sentiment in its favor began to crystallize.

Thereupon another first-term Member of this body, J. H. GOEKE, of Ohio, a lawyer of eminent ability and a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, at the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS], redrafted the Lewis bill, simplifying its terms, and again introduced it in this House.

As reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads the pending Post Office appropriation bill contains only the most meager provisions touching a parcel post. The reported bill provides for the transmission of packages through the mails up to 11 pounds, but fixes the rate at 12 cents a pound. This would be an improvement over the present law, which limits the weight to 4 pounds and fixes the rate at 16 cents a pound. But the change is insufficient to give any relief from the express companies, because the proposed rate of 12 cents a pound is still prohibitive, and is in excess of express rates. The bill reported by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads also provides for carrying packages up to 11 pounds, originating and ending on the same rural route, at 25 cents for 11 pounds and correspondingly low rates for smaller packages.

It was conceded by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads [Mr. MOON], in opening the debate upon the pending Post Office appropriation bill several days ago, that neither one of the two provisions carried in the bill would afford any substantial relief to the public at large. The general provision carrying a rate of 12 cents a pound is too high to compete with express rates, and the latter provision applies only to a package sent from one point to another on the same rural route.

The bill contains a third provision touching this subject, to wit, a section providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate the whole matter and report to Congress next year as to the advisability of establishing a parcel post.

This was the situation that confronted the House at the opening of this debate upon the pending Post Office appropriation bill. Even the two provisions that I have mentioned, concerning the 12-cent general rate and the special rate on rural routes, as ineffectual as they are to give relief, would not be in order under the standing rules of the House, and any Member by merely objecting could have had them stricken from the bill upon its final consideration. The general rule to which I refer is the one prohibiting any new legislation being included in an appropriation bill.

Confronted, as we were, with this situation, and there being much sentiment in the House for the enactment of a general and effectual parcel post at this session, the Committee on Rules last Thursday a week ago brought in a special rule, for adoption or rejection by the House, making not only the two provisions already in the bill in order, but also making the Lewis-Goeke bill, which I mentioned at the beginning, in order. The House adopted this rule by a decisive vote.

At this time I desire to say a few words in favor of adopting the Lewis-Goeke bill as a part of the pending Post Office appropriation bill; and I hope and believe that when the bill is offered as an amendment to the main bill it will be adopted.

The Lewis-Goeke bill provides that on July 1, 1913, the Government shall, under the jurisdiction of the Post Office Department, establish a parcel express. The rates are to be fixed by the Postmaster General, and packages are to be carried practically at cost, but not at a loss. A zone system is to be established, so that the Government will get more for a long haul of an express package than for a short haul.

Of course the Government parcel express will drive the private express companies out of business. The private express companies will no longer have need for much of their equipment. Therefore the Lewis-Goeke bill is only fair in providing for the taking over by the Government of such of the equipment of the express companies as the Government may desire and be able to use in its business, and at the actual cash value of the property so taken over.

The Lewis-Goeke bill does not provide for paying the express companies anything for their so-called franchises. They have no franchises. The Government does not propose by the bill to pay the express companies one cent for their watered stock or give them any compensation for the speculative profits that the companies will lose as a result of being superseded in the business by the Government.

Therefore the argument that has been made here by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to the effect that the express companies would welcome this bill as an opportunity to unload their old junk on the Government is not well taken. The Government simply proposes by the Lewis-Goeke bill to go into the express business on July 1, 1913, and to take over such of the actual tangible property of the express companies as it can use in the business at its actual cash value and no more. Nothing could be fairer than this.

There is nothing radical about the parcel express. It amounts only to an extension of the functions of the Post Office Department, and along the same lines that the department is now doing business.

It must be remembered that a parcel express does not mean Government ownership any more than the present post-office business means Government ownership. Neither the postal department nor the express companies are the actual carriers of the parcels now transported. They are the conductors of the carriage. The railroads do the carrying. In the case of mail parcels the postal department sends along with the shipment a few men to see that it is properly conducted and to see that the several parcels are sent to their proper destinations. In the case of express packages the express companies send along their men with the shipment for the same identical purpose.

At the present time this work is largely duplicated. Express cars are attached to the same trains with the mail cars. Sometimes the same car will be partitioned off so that one half is occupied by a mail clerk and the other half by an express messenger. A parcel express would result in a great saving of expense by the elimination of duplication in the matter of employees as well as of equipment.

The parcel express will simply result in the postal department employing more railway mail clerks or railway express clerks and more clerks and carriers at the various distributing points. It will result in hiring more men in the postal department, but it will not result in Government ownership. It will result in enlarging the post offices and Government buildings used for post-office purposes in the various towns and cities to accommodate the increased business, and will result in the purchase of additional wagons, trucks, and so forth; but all of this extra expense will be met by the increased revenues of the Post Office Department.

The parcel express will be self-sustaining from the start and will give the public transportation for small packages at probably one-third the amount now paid the express companies.

Under the parcel express the Government will undoubtedly carry packages up to 100 pounds. What the people need is reasonable rates upon packages up to 100 pounds in weight. The railroads have fixed 100 pounds as the minimum in fixing their rates. That is to say, the railroads charge the same rate for any package sent by freight under 100 pounds as they charge for a 100-pound package.

It is upon the carriage of packages between 1 pound and 100 pounds that the express companies now have a practical monopoly. It costs a citizen of Portland, my home city, almost as much for express charges on a box of fruit sent from any point out in the State as the producer gets at the point of shipment.

The parcel express will reduce the high cost of living. It will form a conduit between the farm in the country and the kitchen in the city. It will prove itself to be a great public utility, which, when once established, no one would think of giving up any more than we would now think of turning over the carriage of our letters to the express companies.

I have received protests against the parcel post from merchants in my State based on the ground that it would aid the mail-order houses and drive the country merchant out of business. That objection will be met by the zone system. Besides, it is an ungrounded apprehension, in my opinion. It is based upon the most palpable sophistry. If cheap transportation rates of packages under 100 pounds would drive the country merchants out of business, then a reduction of rates by the express companies would be a calamity to the country merchants instead of a blessing. It must be that the express companies have used arguments upon the country merchants that are specious in the extreme to convince them that the express companies are favoring them by charging them excessive rates. According to that argument the country merchants should petition the express companies to make a still higher rate, for if a high rate is a good thing a higher rate would be a better thing.

But, on the other hand, I have received resolutions from 12,000 farmers in Oregon in favor of the Lewis-Goeke bill. And from the men and women in Portland who work for a living, and who are now contributing a dollar or two apiece every month to the express companies above the profits that are fairly earned, I have received hundreds of letters favoring a general parcel post. Therefore I favor the Lewis-Goeke bill, which will give the country something that is even better than a parcel post, to wit, a parcel express. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask that we proceed now with the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

"Provided further, That after the 1st of July, 1917, the Postmaster General shall not approve or allow to be used or pay for any full railway post-office car not constructed of steel, steel underframe, or equally indestructible material, and not less than 20 per cent of the new equipment shall be put into operation annually after July, 1912; and after the passage of this act no contract shall be entered into for the construction of steel underframe cars."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a request for unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago, on page 11, an amendment was inserted prohibiting the opening of post offices on Sunday for the delivery of mail. I ask unanimous consent that instead of the amendment which was inserted at that time there may be inserted in lieu thereof the amendment which I now send to the desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to insert in lieu of the amendment adopted the amendment which the Clerk will now report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting on page 11, lines 24 and 25, in lieu of the amendment agreed to, the following:

"In all, $37,878,000: Provided, That hereafter post offices of the first and second classes shall not be opened on Sundays for the purpose of delivering mail to the general public, but this provision shall not prevent the prompt delivery of special-delivery mail.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MANN. Page 25 is the next page, Mr. Chairman, to be considered.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman from Missouri be willing to let his matter go over until Tuesday next?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will not the gentleman from Illinois be willing that I should offer the amendment now and have it pending, and then, I understand, there is to be a request for unanimous consent to let another matter come in ahead of it.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is to be permitted to introduce his amendment at this time, I desire the privilege of introducing an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman from Missouri has a right to introduce his amendment at this time, under the rule.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to offer an amendment to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be recognized at the proper time. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 25, at the end of line 7, insert the following:

"That for the purposes of this act certain highways of the several States, and the civil subdivisions thereof, are classified as follows:

"Class A shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide composed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam, graded, crowned, compacted, and maintained in such manner that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface, and all other roads having a road track not less than 9 feet wide of a construction equally smooth, firm, durable, and expensive, and continuously kept in proper repair. Class B shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface. Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times. That whenever the United States shall use any highway of any State, or civil subdivision thereof, which falls within classes A, B, or C, for the purpose of transporting rural mail, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile for highways of class A, $20 per annum per mile for highways of class B, and $15 per annum per mile for highways of class C. The United States shall not pay any compensation or toll for such use of such highways other than that provided for in this section, and shall pay no compensation whatever for the use of any highway not falling within classes A, B, or C. That any question arising as to the proper classification of any road used for transporting rural mail shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. That the compensation herein provided for shall be paid at the end of each fiscal year by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Postmaster General to the officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act.

"The provisions of this paragraph shall go into effect on the 1st day of July, 1913."

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], the chairman of the committee, desires now to ask unanimous consent that another paragraph be permitted to take precedence of the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. There are several paragraphs in the bill that will probably take no time at all. I suppose the gentleman would not desire to proceed with the consideration of his amendment to-night without a fairly full House?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be passed at this time until we have considered section 5 under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to pass the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri until the committee has considered section 5. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DODDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to that same page, at the end of line 6.

The CHAIRMAN. What page is that?

Mr. DODDS. Page 25.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I object. Let us proceed with the consideration of section 5 now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that under the rule sections 2, 3, and 4 should precede section 5.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have asked unanimous consent, and I thought obtained it, that we proceed with section 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that that can be done in the committee. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent to pass by sections 2, 3, and 4.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Very well, I will so make the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to pass by sections 2, 3, and 4 and take up section 5. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will read section 5.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That on and after July 1 next, following the passage of this act, letter carriers in the City Delivery Service and clerks in first and second class post offices shall be required to work not more than 8 hours a day: Provided, That the 8 hours of service shall not extend over a longer period than 10 consecutive hours, and the schedules of duty of the employees shall be regulated accordingly.

That in cases of emergency, or if the needs of the service require, letter carriers in the City Delivery Service and clerks in first and second class post offices can be required to work in excess of eight hours a day, and for such additional services they shall be paid extra in proportion to their salaries as fixed by law.

That should the needs of the service require the employment on Sunday of letter carriers in the City Delivery Service and clerks in first and second class post offices, the employees who are required and ordered to perform Sunday work shall be allowed compensatory time on one of the six days following the Sunday on which they perform such service.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Page 29, line 13, insert after the word "accordingly" the following——

The CHAIRMAN (interrupting the reading). The Chair will say that that paragraph was passed.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, I tried to get the floor; to get the eye of the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that if the gentleman from Wisconsin was trying to get the eye of the Chair, he will entertain the amendment.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, he was doing that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, line 13, insert after the word "accordingly" the following: "And that all postal clerks employed shall be permitted the use of chairs at least during two hours every day while at work."

Mr. BERGER. Mr Chairman, we have the most efficient postal clerks in the world. It has been shown that the average postal clerk in America handles about 52,000 pieces of mail annually. The average clerk in England handles a little over one-half that number. In Germany it is less, I believe—about 25,000 pieces a year. I am not quite sure about the exactness of these figures; therefore I will ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS], who has given us the table of the International Postal Union in one of his speeches recently.

Mr. LEWIS. Twenty-eight thousand in Germany.

Mr. BERGER. Well, at any rate, over 50,000 in this country. It is hard work for these clerks to stand sometimes for 10 or 11 hours—when they work overtime—without having permission to use a chair. It may appear like a matter of minor importance, but comforts of life are made up of small things and so are many annoying discomforts. I believe the work of our postal department would not suffer if the clerks would be permitted to use a chair at least for two hours a day. Legislators are trying to help the clerks in the department stores by compelling the proprietors to furnish chairs and to permit the clerks to use them. Our Government should be the model employer; therefore, why not allow the postal employees, wherever that can be done without interfering with the service, to use chairs some time during the day?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's amendment, I think, says "chair." Would not stools be used in many cases?

Mr. BERGER. I accept the amendment. Chairs or stools, benches, or anything that the clerks can sit on.

Mr. MANN. Evidently in many cases stools would be naturally used in place of chairs.

Mr. BERGER. I should be willing to have the words "stools" and "benches" inserted.

Mr. CANNON. Does this mean the clerk must stand the other six hours?

Mr. MANN. No; but I understand it to mean he is to sit down for two hours.

Mr. CANNON. The clerk ordinarily in a post office does sit.

Mr. MANN. This is to require them to furnish chairs or stools so they may sit for at least two hours a day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to amend his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Are they deprived of that right?

Mr. MANN. I am not sure but what this will permit good service where men have to stand up to do the work part of the time at least.

Mr. BERGER. If my amendment is agreed to, there will be two hours a day when postal clerks will be permitted to sit down while at work. They may get permission to sit three or four hours if the nature of their work should permit, but two hours every day would be the minimum. And the clerks could be shifted around in their work in order to make this possible.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield? Are post-office clerks required to stand now?

Mr. BERGER. They are in most instances, as far as I know. It is unnecessary for me to state here that the complaints come from clerks. I know it is against the rules to complain to Congressmen, but, of course, the clerks are safe as far as I am concerned.

Mr. MURDOCK. The purpose of the gentleman is to afford opportunity for the clerks to sit——

Mr. BERGER. Part of the time while they are at work.

Mr. MURDOCK. Without interfering with the discharge of their duties? Why is it limited to two hours a day; why not authorize or require the department to furnish these stools or chairs so the clerks, when not engaged in the discharge of their duties, may sit at any time?

Mr. MANN. Well, they are engaged in the discharge of their duties.

Mr. MURDOCK. I mean in such a way as not to interfere with the discharge of their duties.

Mr. BERGER. I am willing to accept any reasonable suggestion, so long as the clerks get an opportunity to rest their feet at least part of the time.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not know whether that can be done or not.

Mr. CANNON. Does this mean simply a vacation of two hours each day?

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether there would be any serious objection to this amendment if there is any serious reason for it, but it seems to me that the House does not want to go into a direction of the administration of the affairs of the post office as to how many chairs there shall be in an office, who shall sit in them, how long, and how many stools. I take it that all would have to be connected with this two hours proposal. I hope the House will not undertake to go into details of that sort on a proposition of this sort. It is not desired by the clerks.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the "noes" seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BERGER) there were—ayes 35, noes 55.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, I understand they want to pass the Mississippi bill to-night, and I withdraw the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks a quorum is present.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

That should the needs of the service require the employment on Sunday of letter carriers in the City Delivery Service and clerks in first and second class post offices, the employees who are required and ordered to perform Sunday work shall be allowed compensatory time on one of the six days following the Sunday on which they perform such service.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri was passed by to take up section 5. Now, before we do anything else, I think the gentleman ought to ask unanimous consent to take up the other sections, if he desires to do so, so that the gentleman from Minnesota does not lose his right.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that before considering the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri we consider sections 2, 3, and 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that before considering the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri the committee consider sections 2, 3, and 4. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I understand when these sections are considered the gentleman intends to move that the committee rise?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. No contract for furnishing supplies to the Post Office Department or the postal service shall be made with any person who has entered, or proposed to enter, into any combination to prevent the making of any bid for furnishing such supplies, or to fix a price or prices therefor, or who has made any agreement, or given or performed, or promised to give or perform, any consideration whatever to induce any other person not to bid for any such contract, or to bid at a specified price or prices thereon; and if any person so offending is a contractor for furnishing such supplies, his contract may be annulled, and the person so offending shall be liable to a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, and may be further punished, in the discretion of the court, by imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than one year.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules at that point the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] is in order.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, under that rule I offer the following amendment.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the gentleman offering his amendment, but I suggest that the request for unanimous consent was that we take it up out of order and consider sections 2, 3, and 4.

Mr. BARNHART. If it is so understood we shall return to this page and then take it up.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thought it proper to call the attention of the committee to the fact, in order that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] might not lose his opportunity.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be taken up when we again meet and after the disposition of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] asks unanimous consent that the amendment proposed to be offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] may be taken up after the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] is disposed of. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to print the amendment he proposes to offer, together with an amendment which he proposes to offer to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that has already been done.

Mr. FOSTER. Not the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BARNHART. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to print the amendment to the amendment in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the amendment to the amendment proposed to be offered by him. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART]:

"That it shall be unlawful for any person, association, or corporation to enter or deposit, or to have entered or deposited, into the mails of the United States any newspaper, magazine, or other periodical publication of like kind, unless such publication shall have plainly printed in a conspicuous place therein the name or names of the managing editor or managing editors, the name or names of the publisher or publishers, and the name or names of the owner or owners, including the name or names of the owner or owners of stock, bonds, or other securities, to the amount of $500 or more, which have been issued or sold by the said person, association, or corporation owning or controlling such publication and which may be outstanding. Also all editorial or other reading matter published in any circulating periodical for the insertion of which money or other consideration is accepted by the publisher or publishers shall be plainly marked "advertisement" or signed by the name or names of the person or persons in whose interest or interests such article is published. Any person, association, or corporation that shall so enter or deposit, or have entered or deposited in the mails of the United States any such newspaper, magazine, or periodical publication of like kind in violation of the foregoing provisions shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be fined in any sum not less than $100 nor more than $1,000 for each offense."

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. When, after a weighing of the mails for the purpose of readjusting the compensation for their transportation on a railroad route, mails are diverted therefrom or thereto, the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, ascertain the effect of such diversion by a weighing of such mails for such number of successive working days as he may determine, and have the weights stated and verified to him as in other cases, and readjust the compensation on the routes affected accordingly: Provided, That no readjustment shall be made unless the diverted mails equal at least 10 per cent of the average daily weight on any of the routes affected.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 21279) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

REBUILDING OF LEVEES.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the Senate joint resolution No. 102 and agree to the same with certain amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] asks unanimous consent for the discharge of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors from the further consideration of Senate joint resolution 102, and for the present consideration of the same. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the Senate resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. 102) relative to the rebuilding of certain levees on the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to rebuild, by contract or otherwise, in accordance with such plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission as may be approved by the Chief of Engineers, such portions of the levees on the Mississippi River and its tributaries as may have been or may hereafter be broken by the existing flood in said rivers, or so materially weakened as to necessitate rebuilding, and the sum of $1,500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for this purpose out of funds remaining in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall keep an account of the actual cost of all work done under the provisions of this resolution, and upon completion of the work he shall report the total cost thereof to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause a sum equal to the cost so reported to be deducted from the appropriations that may hereafter be made for improving the Mississippi River from Head of Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, and to be carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this resolution be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] asks unanimous consent that this resolution be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will read the joint resolution for amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask, inasmuch as the resolution has just been read, that further reading be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask to amend the resolution, in line 13, page 1, by striking out the words "funds remaining" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "any money."

Mr. CANNON. May I ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] a question? That would necessitate the bill going back to the Senate. Does the gentleman think the amendment is really material?

Mr. MANN. There is another amendment that we want to put in anyhow.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I did not think the amendment was material, really, but there is another amendment that has been insisted upon, and this amendment was suggested by another gentleman in the House, and I just agreed to it.

Mr. CANNON. All right.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Speaker, in line 6, on page 2, I move to amend by striking out the word "may" and inserting the words "shall first."

The SPEAKER. There is not any line 6 on page 2 of the engrossed copy of this bill.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. This resolution that I have in my hand is the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk now has the same copy as the gentleman from Mississippi. The Clerk will report the amendment. But, first, will the gentleman from Mississippi please repeat his amendment?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In line 6 of page 2 strike out the word "may" and insert in lieu thereof the words "shall first."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 6, strike out the word "may" and insert in lieu thereof the words "shall first."

Mr. BUTLER. How will that read then, Mr. Speaker?

The Clerk read as follows:

So that it will read: "Shall be deducted from the appropriations that shall first hereafter be made for improving the Mississippi River," etc.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the amended Senate joint resolution.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Within the last two or three days very serious damage, I am advised, has been done by the high water of the Missouri in the neighborhood of Sioux City, Iowa, and the levees in that stream both in Iowa and Nebraska, and, perhaps, South Dakota. Would this emergency fund, in the language of the resolution, be broad enough to meet the emergencies of the situation there?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The language of the resolution is—

Such portions of the levees on the Mississippi River and its tributaries as may have been or may hereafter be broken by the existing flood in said rivers or so materially weakened as to necessitate rebuilding.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I have not had the opportunity to examine the resolution, but my impression is that the language is broad enough to cover that situation. Is that so?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. My impression is that the language is broad enough to cover that situation on any of the tributaries of the rivers where the levees have been broken by the existing flood or that may hereafter be broken by it or so weakened as to require rebuilding.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. Is it not true that this arrangement will affect only those levees that are under the control of the Mississippi River Commission?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; that is not true.

Mr. LLOYD. I do not remember exactly the wording of the resolution. What connection has the Mississippi River Commission with this resolution?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The Mississippi River Commission has jurisdiction over the levees on the Mississippi River from Cape Girardeau to the Head of the Passes. But there are other levees on the Ohio River and on the Arkansas River and on the Red River that are not under the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission.

Mr. LLOYD. The reason I ask that question is that there are some levees broken on the Mississippi River between Keokuk, Iowa, and Hannibal, Mo., and we are anxious that they shall be cared for under this resolution.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. If they are broken or so materially weakened as to necessitate rebuilding, they would come within the language of this resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. As I understand this resolution and another resolution in the House, as originally prepared, they did not provide for anything except the levees of the Mississippi River between Cairo and the Passes, and the amendments were inserted in this resolution for the purpose of covering levees on the tributaries of the Mississippi River as well as on the Mississippi River above Cairo. That is the understanding of the War Department?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; that is the understanding of the War Department. It is our understanding here, at any rate.

Mr. MANN. It is my understanding that that is the understanding of the War Department.

Mr. DYER. Does not the resolution so state?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the particular levees that I discussed with the Chief of Engineers when I prepared this resolution, or when I was preparing it, rather, were the levees on the Mississippi River, of course, and the levees on the Ohio River near Mound City, and some levees on the Arkansas River and on the Red River. We did not discuss particularly the levees up on the Mississippi River at Keokuk.

Mr. MANN. The authority of the resolution is the same?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It is broad enough, undoubtedly.

Mr. MANN. My colleague from Illinois [Mr. THISTLEWOOD] is interested in the levees in Cairo, and my colleague [Mr. FOWLER] is interested in the levees on the Ohio River. Mr. THISTLEWOOD went to the War Department, and he told me that he was informed up there that this resolution as it passed the Senate was sufficient to cover all of these cases.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. That was certainly the opinion of the Chief of Engineers when I was in conference with him the other day. This resolution is identical with the resolution introduced by myself and reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. It was identical——

Mr. MANN. Not identical.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; it was not identical, either.

Mr. MANN. Until they stuck in the "tributaries of the Mississippi River."

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. Or the "materially weakened levees."

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, no; my resolution did have the "tributaries of the Mississippi River" in it. The only amendment the Senate made to it was to add the words:

Or so materially weakened as to necessitate rebuilding.

Mr. MANN. I supposed the resolution introduced by the gentleman was the same as the resolution introduced in the Senate.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It was, and it had the "tributaries of the Mississippi River" in it. The only amendment the Senate put on was the amendment I have just suggested.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the amended Senate joint resolution.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to a third reading and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

FERNANDO PAGE.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 517.

Resolved, That there shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Fannie Page, widow of Fernando Page, late messenger in the House of Representatives on soldiers' roll, an amount equal to six months' salary as such messenger and an additional amount, not to exceed $250, to pay the funeral expenses of said Fernando Page.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Page was a messenger on the soldiers' roll. He died last night, and the necessity for the passage of the resolution at the present time is to provide the means for the family to transport his body from here to Michigan.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, it does not require unanimous consent, does it?

Mr. LLOYD. I think it does, because the resolution is not reported from the committee.

Mr. MANN. I suppose it does not make any difference, but are not these soldiers' roll employees called messengers on the soldiers' roll instead of doorkeepers?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; I think we had better change that.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "doorkeeper" and insert in lieu thereof the word "messenger."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MAGDALENA BAY.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to insert in the RECORD the following article published in the Washington Herald, referring to an article published in the San Francisco Examiner, relative to the Japanese obtaining a large tract of land, 700 miles of fishing rights, and so forth, in Mexico:

[From the Washington Herald, Apr. 26, 1912.]

JAPS AT MAGDALENA BAY—SECURE LANDS AND FISHING RIGHTS AND ELABORATE SURVEYS ARE BEING MADE.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., April 26, 1912.

Present conditions at Magdalena Bay, Mexico, are reported in a special dispatch to the Examiner as follows:

"The concession made to private company, backed by Soichiro Asano, president of the Oriental Steamship Co. and a wealthy banker."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, April 29, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

BUFFALO, N. Y., April 17, 1912.

Hon. JAMES O'GORMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We urge you to use your influence to defeat the Owen bill now before the Senate, providing for a department or bureau of health. There is no public demand for it, and it will not protect health any better than it is now protected. It is a subtle and dangerous bill and would confer special power to a privilege-seeking class who would use their new power to force certain methods of treatment upon the citizens whether sick or well regardless of their wishes. Recent compulsory vaccination against typhoid in the Army and Navy is proof. We have 15,000 members in this State, many of whom are physicians of all schools, who are sure the Owen bill threatens the freedom of the individual to select the practitioner of his choice in time of illness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I present certain data prepared by the secretary of the Federal Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation Commission in reference to the operation of British workmen's compensation acts. I ask that the paper be printed as a Senate document.

ADDRESSES BY PRESIDENT TAFT AND EX-PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and as a public document the address of President Taft, delivered on the 25th day of April at Boston (S. Doc. No. 615).

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator to request that it be printed in the RECORD and also as a public document.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Why not just print it as a public document?

Mr. REED. That would be satisfactory, if the Senator objects to its going into the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I also ask the Senator if it is a report of the speech or is it the speech actually delivered?

Mr. REED. It is the speech delivered; it purports to have been printed from manuscript; and it ought to be absolutely correct. It is from the Washington Post. I am not asking to have anything printed but the speech.

Mr. SMOOT. I will hand the speech to the Senator, so that there may be no mistake. I have no objection at all to its being printed as a public document.

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the date of the speech?

Mr. REED. It is the speech of President Taft, delivered April 25, 1912.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator if he proposes to have printed the reply?

Mr. REED. At this time I am asking to have printed the speech.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order is entered to print the speech as a public document.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, I will ask that the speech of ex-President Roosevelt in reply, delivered on the 26th day of April at Worcester, Mass., be printed as a public document (S. Doc. No. 616). I think that this is but fair, in order that these valuable contributions to our national history may be preserved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order will be entered to print, as requested.

Mr. REED. I now ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document the reply of President Taft to the reply of ex-President Roosevelt to the reply of President Taft (S. Doc. No. 617).

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order therefor will be entered.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the order is made, I should like to ask the Senator if the reply is simply as reported in the papers, or is it the reply actually delivered by the President? If it is simply a newspaper report, I certainly would object to its being printed as a public document unless it is absolutely correct.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it is the prepared statement of the President given to the press, and it is as printed in this morning's Washington Post, a very reliable paper, at least when it is reporting the President.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection at all, if it is the reply.

Mr. REED. It bears the purported signature, in print, of course, of the President.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection, if it bears the signature of the President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the order is entered as requested.

PAYMENT OF MONEY IN POLITICAL CAMPAIGNS.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. From the Committee on Privileges and Elections I report back with amendments Senate resolution 79, and I submit a report (No. 681) thereon.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it had better go over, Mr. President. I should like to look at it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to have the resolution appear in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the resolution before it goes over.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, First. That the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate be, and it is hereby, directed to inquire and report to the Senate as early as practicable the amount of money subscribed and paid to the national committees of all political parties and the national congressional campaign committees of all political parties or to any member of such committee, or to any person acting under the authority of or on behalf of such committee as treasurer or otherwise, by any person, firm, association, corporation, or committee to influence the result or attempt to influence the result of the election November 8, 1904, and November 3, 1908, at which Representatives in the Congress of the United States were elected, giving the names of such persons, firms, associations, corporations, or committees, and the respective amounts subscribed and paid by each of them as aforesaid.

Second. That said committee is authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during any recess of the Senate or of the Congress; to hold sessions at such place or places as it may deem most convenient for the purposes of this inquiry; to employ stenographers and such other clerical force as may be deemed necessary; to send for persons, books, records, and papers; to administer oaths; and that the expenses of the inquiry be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

Third. That said committee shall also report to the Senate what measures, if any, are necessary to further prohibit or curtail such subscriptions and payments so as to lessen and confine them to proper and legitimate objects in relation to such elections and prevent the undue or corrupt use of money in such elections.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Texas if this is the resolution he offered some time ago?

Mr. CULBERSON. I offered it June 22, 1911.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall not object to its present consideration. I did not understand it to be that resolution.

Mr. CULBERSON. It was reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate March 4 last, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The resolution is before the Senate and the Secretary will report the amendments of the committee.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 2, after the word "Senate," to insert the words "or any subcommittee thereof"; in line 7, to strike out the word "committee" and insert the word "committees"; in line 9, to strike out the word "committee" and insert the word "committees"; on page 2, line 4, after the word "committee," to insert the words "or subcommittees"; in line 10, to strike out "book" and insert "books"; and in line 13, after the word "committee," to insert the words "or subcommittee," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, First. DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I ask that Senate bill No. 1 be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, Senate bill No. 1 will be laid before the Senate for purposes of discussion only, as the Chair understands.

Mr. WORKS. That is my desire.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1) to establish a department of health, and for other purposes.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, this bill presents some serious and important questions. For that reason I have prepared what I desire to say with more than ordinary care in order that I may be as nearly accurate as possible. I desire that what I say shall appear in consecutive order, and therefore I ask the indulgence of Senators that I may not be interrupted during the delivery of my remarks.

The speech is longer than I should like to have it; it contains a number of quotations that I shall not wish to read, and I ask in advance that I may be allowed to omit the reading of such quotations as I desire without asking leave to do so specifically in each instance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted as requested.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I had the honor, soon after I became a member of this body, to discuss this bill from the standpoint of Christian Scientists, to whom, in its then form, it was most objectionable. Since then it has been amended in a number of material particulars, relieving it, in some respects, from the objections then urged against it. At this time I desire to consider it in a broader and more comprehensive way, as it affects not Christian Scientists alone but the whole people. This will necessarily lead me to comment not only upon the bill as it appears on its face, but upon the forces and motives behind it, and the ultimate objects and purposes of this movement, who want it, and what for.

I am sorry that I feel myself impelled by a sense of duty to say some unpleasant things, but I shall say them as pleasantly as I can, and without any intention of giving offense. I shall have to question and challenge some of the most cherished beliefs and convictions of Members of this body and of many other good people, convictions sincerely and honestly entertained by them. But I am happy to say that I entertain no sense of malice, hatred, or ill will toward any human being, alive or dead, or of unfriendly antagonism toward the views, honestly entertained, of any man. I shall not hesitate, however, to speak my own convictions freely and frankly and to point out and comment without reserve upon some of the evils that are attempted to be maintained and perpetuated by this bill and legislation which is expected to follow it.

I shall feel myself called upon to assail the motives and conduct of members of the medical profession, in their organized form, as the American Medical Association. But this is in no sense a personal matter, nor is it prompted by any sense of ill will. There are many high-minded, noble, self-sacrificing men and women in the profession who are conscientiously devoting their lives to the healing of disease and the amelioration of human suffering. In what I shall say on this subject, I am not speaking of such as these, but of the self-seeking, intolerant political doctors who are serving their own selfish interests and not the public good.

The avowed purpose of seeking new legislation was, in the beginning, to establish a department of Government with a doctor of medicine at its head, a member of the President's Cabinet, possessed of the almost autocratic, unlimited, and unrestrained power belonging to such a department. This movement was instigated and maintained by the American Medical Association, one of the most powerful trusts, in its management, in the country. While there were many sincere and honest, but misguided, people inside and outside of the association behind it, the motive power which was pressing it forward was this political branch of the association. Its officials and agents, with their powerful organization, were simply using its members and others less selfish and unpopular to deceive the public and Congress and conceal the real motives that actuated the effort. This motive and the real object, purely selfish on their part, were studiously and skillfully concealed under the mask of humanitarianism. The League for Medical Freedom, a voluntary organization composed of hundreds of thousands of citizens of all classes in all walks of life, knowing the hypocrisy of the instigators of new legislation on this subject, made common cause against it and have exposed its objects and pointed out the injurious effects of the passage of the proposed bill. One of the chief causes of complaint was that it would create a monopoly in one school of medicine, with one of their number, a Cabinet officer, at its head, to the exclusion of every other school of medicine or other modes of healing. This purpose was disclaimed by the author of the bill, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], but the form of the bill, the fact that then and now all surgeons and other medical employees of the Government were and are of that school of medicine, to the exclusion of all others, and the declarations of parties interested in the bill as to their ultimate object and purpose in urging the passage of it showed conclusively that the Senator from Oklahoma was entirely mistaken.

It became so apparent that such was the purpose, and it was so obnoxious to every man who believes in medical as well as religious freedom, that friends of the bill voluntarily offered the following amendment to relieve it from this objection which they soon found would defeat it:

And provided further, That the bureau of health established by this act shall have no power to regulate the practice of medicine or the practice of healing or to interfere with the right of a citizen to employ the practitioner of his choice, and all appointments within the bureau, including the head of the bureau, shall be made without discrimination against any school of medicine or of healing.

They soon found, also, that the effort to secure a place in the Cabinet and make the health bureau a department of the Government was hopeless, and that was abandoned.

Thus shorn of the things they most desired, the bill has become unnecessary and useless. It adds no power to the several bureaus in the different departments intended to protect and preserve the public health, and can not increase their activities, except that of collecting and disseminating information. Therefore, if I did not know that this abandonment of the objectionable features of the bill was for the ulterior purpose of making it a beginning and then following it up step by step until they have attained their original object, which they could not reach by direct action, I should have but little reason to consume the time of the Senate in opposing its passage.

But, Mr. President, I know what I am talking about when I say to the Senate that they have never abandoned their original purpose of taking over into their own hands the medical activities of the Government and of confining their administration and the enforcement of their powers in the one school of medicine to the exclusion of all others. As I shall show the Senate a little later, some of these doctors and their publications, less discreet than some others, have made the most startling statements of their intention to establish and control a state medicine in its most extreme and objectionable form. Since the bill has been amended, as I have stated, I said to one of the most earnest supporters of the idea of a department of medicine, and a distinguished citizen and educator, "Why do you want this bill in its amended form? It does not increase the powers of the medical bureaus or accomplish anything you want." He said, "It is not satisfactory to us, but it will be a beginning and we will follow it up until we get what we want," or words to that effect.

This was a frank and perfectly honest declaration of their purpose and intention, and their reason, and the only plausible reason, for accepting a bill with everything that they really wanted taken out of it by amendment.

Therefore, Mr. President, I am going to consider this bill precisely as if it provided in terms for the things to which I so seriously object, because that is the ultimate purpose which should be met at the outset, and this bill is only one step toward its final accomplishment. But for the final object in view the bill would not be worth the attention of its alleged friends.

Mr. President, there are various healing agencies at work in this country to-day. Some are schools of medical healing which depend upon drugs as the means of cure. Others depend upon manipulation of the body; others depend upon the action of one mind upon another as a means of healing; and still another upon the operation of the Divine mind in the establishment of harmony, the regeneration of man and his restoration to health by that means. To the latter the use of drugs is regarded as a menace to life and health and opposed to their conscientious religious beliefs.

These different schools and other modes of healing may be divided into groups. It is impossible in the scope of such an address as this to consider or even mention them all. I will, therefore, confine myself to a few of the leading ones of each class. In the schools of healing by drugs may be named the allopaths, the homeopaths, and the eclectics. The healing by the action of one mind over another may be classed under the general designation of mesmerism, hypnotism, or suggestion—all meaning practically the same thing—and Christian Science, the one distinctive mode of healing by the operation of the Divine mind according to the teachings of Jesus of Nazareth.

No two of these schools of medicine, or other modes of healing, agree with each other. While some of them agree in the use of drugs as a means of healing, they are entirely at variance as to the kinds of medicines to be used, the quantity to be administered, and the principle upon which the system of drug healing is based. The allopathic school of medicine is the oldest and best known. Its devotees are wholly dogmatic and intolerant. They assume that there is no other efficacious mode of healing but theirs, and that all other practitioners are incompetents and a menace to the public health. They have formed one of the most powerful organizations of any kind in the country. They are ruthlessly using that power not to improve the practitioners of their own school only but to coerce all people to accept their remedies and to suppress, by law and by persecution, the practice of other means of healing. The American Medical Association is working in every State in the Union to secure laws which will prevent any but practitioners of their school from practicing the art of healing. They have secured such laws in some of the States, as I shall show farther along, and are tireless in their efforts to secure other like restrictive laws in all other States. Having only partially succeeded in their efforts in this direction in the States, they have for a long time been besieging Congress to help them to entrench themselves with all the powers of the Government behind them where they will be supreme and may absolutely exclude all other practitioners than theirs from the practice of healing. They are using all the money and influence they can bring to bear and are practicing on the credulity of an ignorant public sentiment by the pretense that all of this is for the public good. Through their efforts the much-dreaded practice of vaccination, which has, in my opinion, sacrificed more lives than it has saved and maimed and made invalids of thousands, has been made compulsory by law; and now other serum remedies, alleged to be preventives of various diseases and equally dangerous, loathsome, and objectionable, are being forced upon the people whether they want them or not.

The officers of the Army and Navy are the willing instruments of these medical men to compel American citizens to submit to be poisoned with their loathsome preparations. If a soldier or sailor refuses to submit to vaccination or other serum treatment for typhoid fever and other diseases, he is promptly dismissed the service, or placed in irons until he submits, or is otherwise punished. And now these doctors want Congress to so legislate as to give them full control of the medical, sanitary, and hygienic activities and bureaus of the Government that their powers may be complete.

The doctors of this school hold every medical position in the Government, to the exclusion of every other school, and no one who believes in the prevention or healing of disease by any other means than theirs need apply.

Mr. President, the one great trouble is that the people do not think for themselves in any matter affecting the public health. They have preferred to rely upon the doctors and to be guided and controlled by them. Public officials and the Congress of the United States do not trouble themselves about it or hold themselves responsible. They generally evince a sublime indifference to the subject beyond what the doctors say or recommend, and the people are fleeced of millions of dollars in alleged works for the public health which had better be thrown away. They have much more faith in the doctors than the doctors have in themselves or in each other. The competent doctor has long since learned that drugs are a poison and that they do not heal. Consequently the conscientious doctor no longer gives or advises the giving or taking of drugs. But the incompetent and selfish and unworthy still makes his living that way.

The allopathic school of medicine is noted for the quantity of medicines they administer and their nauseous and distasteful character—so much so that their mode of treatment is often characterized as cruel and inhuman. So deleterious and harmful are their drugs that the homeopaths claim that a large part of their practice comes from those who have temporarily or permanently suffered from the effects of allopathic drugs. But I am glad to say that the better and more intelligent physicians of their school have given up the use of their strong drugs in a great degree. Their experience has taught them that such drugs do not heal, but engender and cause disease. Let us hope that they may soon reach that degree of intelligence that will lead them to cease the use of any drugs altogether. It would be a blessing to the human race if they would at the same time teach their patients to know what they have learned, that an inanimate drug has no healing quality and had better not be used. The people have been erroneously taught to rely upon drugs for their healing and have blindly believed in them so long that to deprive them of them would be disastrous until they learn that lesson. Drugs and the drug doctors' ministration of them have healed disease only because of the faith of the patient in the doctor and his drugs, and for no other reason. Doctors themselves bear witness to this fact.

In speaking of this subject, Dr. William Osler, formerly of Johns Hopkins Medical School, in an article in the Americana, uses this language:

> Yet after all the psychical method has always played an important though largely unrecognized part in therapeutics. It is from faith, which buoys up the spirits, sets the blood flowing more freely, and the nerves playing their parts without disturbance, that a large part of all cures arises. Despondency, or lack of faith, will often sink the stoutest constitution almost to death's door; faith will enable a bread pill or a spoonful of clear water to do almost miracles of healing when the best medicines have been given over in despair. The basis of the entire profession of medicine is faith in the doctor and his drugs and his methods. This is no new discovery. It was said by Galen that "he works the most cures in whom most have faith," and the doctor-chemist-charlatan Paracelsus, who died of taking a universal panacea too poisonous even for his confidence, told his patients to have full faith and a strong imagination and they would see the effects of it.

This is strong language to come from such a source. The truth of it will not be denied by any well-informed and conscientious medical practitioner.

I ask the Senate to consider carefully this one statement contained in this article:

> The basis of the entire profession of medicine is faith in the doctor and his drugs and his methods.

That is a remarkable statement. It comes from an eminent and noted medical practitioner of the allopathic school, and is a permanent contribution to the mass of information on the subject that can not be entered upon here, appearing as it does in one of the leading modern encyclopedias.

Mr. President, I may be pardoned if I stop here to point out the difference between the patients of medical practitioners and Christian Scientists in respect of this question of faith. The believer in the doctor and his drugs has faith in a human being and his means of cure, while the Christian Scientist has unshaken and supreme faith in the omnipotence and beneficent influence of the Divine Being in the healing of disease. I leave it to the candid judgment of Senators to say which of these is most worthy of faith and trust. But the Christian Scientist does not rest on faith alone, but upon such understanding as he has of the power of God to heal and upon good works by which that healing may be brought about.

The drugging system of the homeopathic school of medicine is entirely different from that of the allopathic school and is founded on a wholly different principle. I have no doubt its rise was largely due to the protest against the cruel and inhuman practices of the old school.

There are some commendable features of homeopathic medication as compared with the old school. Their medicines are less in quantity and not so nauseous or distasteful, and while they can no more heal disease, except by faith, than can the allopathic drugs, they are far less injurious to the human system. They are less harmful to humanity, and that is a good deal.

Then came the modern school of eclectics. The theory of practice adopted by this school is entirely different from the others. Its founder and his followers were still searching for a better means of healing disease and saving human life. And still mankind is not satisfied. It is beginning to be understood now by all medical practitioners that the one great thing to be done is not to heal disease, in which they have signally failed, but to prevent it. They have learned, too, that the way to prevent disease is not by the use of drugs, in the form of serums or otherwise, but in removing the extraneous causes of disease and preventing them from reaching the human body. It is generally believed by all civilized and enlightened people that lack of sanitation is, as men see things, one of the most prolific causes of disease and death. To this all schools of medicine and healing agree. Veritably cleanliness is next to godliness. But sanitation is not so much the work of the doctors or other practitioners as it is of the skilled sanitary engineer. It is claimed to have been discovered that the sting of the mosquito causes yellow fever, the bite of the fly typhoid fever, and that the ground squirrel is the carrier of bubonic plague. What is the remedy? Obviously, to exterminate the mosquito, the fly, and the ground squirrel. This does not require the services of a doctor or the use of a drug. When either of these breeders and disseminators of disease escapes and the disease is transmitted to the human body, the doctor, with his drugs, is helpless to give relief.

Going a little further in respect of the different modes of healing, we have the osteopathic school. It does not rely upon or use drugs, but relies on the intrinsic powers of the human body itself to restore healthy conditions.

We have also the practice of hypnotism, mesmerism, and suggestion. This alleged means of healing, including "suggestion," so called, is very largely used now by the old-school physician. It is an admission of the inefficacy of drugs. But it is even more dangerous in its use than the drugs themselves.

In 1866 the principle of healing, which is known as Christian Science, came into use, and is very generally practiced. It, too, discards the use of drugs. Unlike all the other modes of healing that I have mentioned, it is religious in its character. The healing is not its religion, but is incidental to and results from its religion. Its healing is not confined to its own religious believers, but is open to all men.

MOTIVE FOR ACTIVITY OF AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION.

There is abundant evidence, which can not be reviewed here, that the efforts of the American Medical Association to secure restrictive legislation affecting other schools of healing and legislation giving its school additional powers and privileges are selfish in the extreme and intolerant and oppressive, as I shall show further along. The motive of this is not far to seek. Of later years, not only have the more modern schools of medicine encroached upon the business of the allopathic doctors and interfered with their receipts, but thousands—yes, millions—of people in this country have learned not to use medicines in any form, much to their advantage in the way of economy and better health. As a result, inroads of the most serious nature have been made on the doctor's business and profits, besides bringing their practice into serious discredit. It was perfectly apparent that something must be done to save their credit and prevent the overthrow of their system of practice. It was a desperate case, and they have resorted to desperate and questionable means to protect their profession from ruin. This movement is not in the interest of humanity, as they would have us believe, but to uphold the prestige and protect the resources of the doctors of the old school of medicine. Their own declarations prove this beyond controversy. I shall a little further along submit for the consideration of the Senate some of their own declarations to that effect, to which others, almost without number, might be added, if it were necessary, coupled with the most startling statements of the extraordinary means resorted to to accomplish their object.

There is no public demand for this legislation. There is no sentiment in favor of it except that of one school of medicine and such as they have manufactured in their own selfish interests under the hypocritical pretense that it is for the public good.

HOW THEY OPERATE.

The doctors of the old school had possession. The people had become dependent upon them for help because they had not yet learned a better way. It was the fear that they would find a better way that spurred them to action. They have not been willing to stand upon their merits and be judged by their fruits; they have fought and persecuted every new school or mode of healing. They have appealed to the legislatures of the States for laws that were prohibitory of other schools and making the practice of medicine by them a crime, and have succeeded in many of the States in procuring such legislation. Their favorite scheme is to have established a board of health in every State, and every county in every State, composed of doctors of their school, and then procure a law making it a criminal offense to practice medicine or healing without first securing a license to practice from their board of health. They opposed and persecuted the homeopaths, the eclectics, and the osteopaths in turn, denouncing them as charlatans, quacks, and incompetents. None of these could, in the beginning of these tactics, procure one of their licenses to practice. But this did not work very long. As these other schools of medicine became stronger and better appreciated by the people legislatures refused to pass these prohibitory laws, and governors of States sometimes vetoed them if they were passed.

The new schools have forced their way into public favor, notwithstanding all this unjust opposition, and now other schools of medicine are given places on boards of health and applicants for licenses to practice by physicians of their schools are given separate examinations by members of their own profession. Every new school or method of healing has been compelled to meet with this same kind of unjust opposition and persecution, and much of it has been accomplished through the legislatures of the States. Many of the better class of allopathic physicians have deplored and opposed this mode of meeting opposition. It has been done mostly by and through the American Medical Association. To secure such restrictive and prohibitory legislation has been one of the chief objects of the association. Of later years their efforts have been directed more particularly against the Christian Scientists. The association has its branches and emissaries in every State and every city of any size in every State. They infest the legislatures of every State in the Union and present bills at every session until they succeed in securing the restrictive laws they want. At this present day they generally fail, but they continue their efforts with an energy and persistency worthy of a better cause. In some of the States, notably in Maryland, Ohio, and Missouri, they have made it a crime for a Christian Scientist to practice healing or to accept compensation therefor.

A conspicuous illustration of their methods may be found in a late order procured by the doctors affecting the Panama Canal Zone. They had an allopathic board of health, with a former president of the American Medical Association at its head. They procured from the President an order in the following form:

EXECUTIVE ORDER TO PROHIBIT THE PRACTICE OF MEDICINE, SURGERY, DENTISTRY, PHARMACY, OR MIDWIFERY WITHOUT A LICENSE.

By virtue of the authority vested in me, I hereby establish the following order for the Canal Zone:

SECTION 1. It shall be unlawful for any person to practice or attempt to practice medicine, surgery, dentistry, pharmacy, or midwifery within the Canal Zone without first having obtained a license therefor from the Board of Health of the Canal Zone. Any person thus offending shall be punished by a fine not exceeding twenty-five dollars ($25) or by imprisonment in jail not exceeding thirty (30) days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That this order shall not apply to commissioned surgeons of the United States Army and Navy or Marine-Hospital Service, nor to physicians, surgeons, dentists, or pharmacists and their assistants and nurses employed by the Isthmian Canal Commission, nor to nurses acting under the orders of a licensed physician

SEC. 2. Any person shall be regarded as practicing medicine within the meaning of this order who shall prescribe for, operate on, or in any wise attempt to heal, cure, or alleviate, or who shall in any wise treat any disease or any physical or mental ailment of another: Provided, That nothing in this order shall be construed to prohibit gratuitous services in case of emergency or to the administering of ordinary household remedies.

SEC. 3. This order shall take effect sixty (60) days from and after this date.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, October 14, 1911.

It will be seen that they so defined the practice of medicine in this order as to make it a crime to attempt to ameliorate sickness or disease in any form or by any means other than their own.

Section 2 of the order would have had the effect to exclude from practice in the Canal Zone every school of medicine except the allopathic school, including Christian Scientists and any and all persons who attempted to cure disease or alleviate suffering in any way by prayer or any means not included in the term "practicing medicine."

Section 3 provided in express terms "that any person shall be regarded as practicing medicine within the meaning of this order who shall in any wise attempt to heal, cure, or alleviate, or who shall in any wise treat any disease or any physical or mental ailment of another." There was no exemption whatever made of any mode of treatment. The evident purpose of the order, as drawn, was to give the allopathic school of medicine absolute and unlimited control of medical affairs in the Canal Zone to the exclusion of every other mode of healing.

When the attention of the President was called to this fact he said at once that he had understood that Christian Scientists were not to be disturbed in their practice by the order, and that if it could be construed as having that effect he would see that it was modified. The matter was taken up with the President and the Secretary of War, who gave it the most careful and conscientious attention, and finally modified the order by inserting the following clause:

Provided, That nothing in this order shall be construed to prohibit (a) the practice of the religious tenets of any church in the administration of the sick or suffering by mental or spiritual means without the use of any drug or material remedy, whether gratuitously or for compensation, provided that such sanitary laws, orders, rules, and regulations as now are, or hereafter may be, in force in said Canal Zone are complied with.

Christian Scientists made no objection to the provision in the order protecting the sanitary regulations of the Canal Zone and their enforcement, but frankly said to the President and Secretary of War that they believed in sanitation, and that the order might be made as strong with respect to that matter as they desired to have it.

But, Mr. President, this Canal Zone order was not the only law, by many, obtained and attempted to be obtained by the American Medical Association. Every State in the Union has some law regulating the practice of medicine and surgery, and every State has a State board of health or examiners from whom a license must be obtained to entitle anyone to practice medicine or surgery. The doctors have gone to extraordinary lengths in the attempt to protect themselves in a monopoly of healing and to exclude from the exercise of their rights all other modes of healing than their own. In the procurement of boards of health, either State or county, the allopathic physicians, acting through the American Medical Association, usually have boards composed solely of their school of medicine, or, if other schools are allowed to be represented, as they are now in many of the States, the allopathic school, usually called by themselves "regulars," invariably have there a majority or a greater number of members on the board than that of any other school of medicine.

In some of the States separate boards of examiners or health boards are provided for three different schools of medicine, namely, the regular or allopathic school, homeopaths, and eclectics. But in no instance, so far as I know, is a majority of members, where there is but one board, given to any but the regular school. Having procured a board of examiners, or board of health, as they are sometimes called, they seek legislation in the different States providing that no one shall practice medicine or surgery until they have procured a license so to do from such board. To this Christian Scientists would make no objection, as they are not practicing medicine or surgery, and their mode of treatment is not within the scope of the title to these various bills. They are almost invariably given the title of bills "to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery," and sometimes midwifery, as indicated in the title. But they meet this situation by providing expressly what shall be included in the term "practice of medicine and surgery," and so define the term as to include modes of healing and practice that are not within the meaning of the words at all.

It may be interesting to the Senate to follow in a brief way the course of legislation on this subject.

With respect to the body of the laws for regulation of the practice of medicine and surgery, these laws, with very few exceptions, provide, first, that no one shall practice without first having obtained a license from the board established by the act. Then they provide just who and what kinds of practice shall be included within the terms of the statute. The ingenuity displayed by these political doctors who have been lobbying for years in every legislature in this country in their effort to insert in these laws some provision that will maintain their monopoly of the practice and exclude everybody else, challenges my admiration. The fact that many of such laws are in exactly the same language shows conclusively that they have been the work of one moving power.

I am going to trouble the Senate by a brief review of these different statutory provisions. They are exceedingly interesting. Of course where the statute contains no definition of the practice of medicine and surgery, no mode of healing that does not use drugs or the knife would be included in its terms or affected in any way. Some of the States have left them just in that condition, and therefore such modes of healing may be practiced in those States beyond doubt.

But, taking up the States in their order: In Alabama no exemption is contained in the statute affecting the question I am now discussing, and the definition of a practitioner within the meaning of the act is as follows:

Any person who treats or offers to treat diseases of human beings by any system whatsoever is considered to be practicing medicine.

Nothing could be more absurd or unjust than this. Everyone knows that the Christian Science mode of practice, for example, is not practicing medicine, because they do not believe in medicines of any kind—do not use them or prescribe them—but are conscientiously opposed to their use. That a legislature of a State should falsify the facts, as is done in an act of this kind, in order to exclude people who are conscientiously endeavoring to heal disease and who have brought health, happiness, and contentment to thousands and thousands of people notwithstanding these restrictive laws, is almost beyond comprehension. It has been done at the instigation of medical practitioners, acting through the American Medical Association, whose attempt is to selfishly retain in themselves a monopoly of healing and exclude everyone else. It is singular that the legislature of a State should allow itself to be used in any such way.

In Arkansas no exemption is made, and when I say no exemption is made I mean as affecting the question which I am now considering, and in defining the scope of the act it is made to include anyone who—prescribes or directs for the use of any person or persons any drug or medicine or other agency for the treatment, cure, or relief of any bodily injury, deformity, or disease.

In California Christian Scientists are excluded from the effects of the statute.

In the State of Colorado the exempting clause provides:

The act does not prohibit gratuitous service in case of emergency, nor the practice of the religious tenets of any church.

Under this exemption the courts of Colorado have held that it applies only to the exercise of religion by a church as a body, and therefore it does not exempt or protect a Christian Science practitioner, who exercises the right of healing, from the penalties of the statute.

In the following States, be it said to their credit, Christian Science is exempted from the provisions of the statute, in express terms: Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, North Dakota, and South Dakota.

In the following States the definition of the act includes the following provision, either in the same words or words having the same meaning and effect: Delaware, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, and New Mexico:

* * * to suggest, recommend, prescribe, or direct for the use of any person any drug, medicine, appliance, or other agency, whether material or not material, for the cure, relief, or palliation of any ailment or disease of the mind or the body.

In the District of Columbia there is no definition of the meaning of the term "practicing medicine or surgery," and therefore Christian Scientists, of course, are not included within its provisions or penalties. The same is true of a number of the States.

In Georgia the act is made to include:

Any person practicing medicine or surgery who prescribes for the sick or those in need of medical or surgical aid and who charge or receive therefor money or other compensation or consideration directly or indirectly.

The meaning and effect of that statute, of course, turns upon the word "prescribes," which, I assume, would apply only to medical treatment.

The statute covering Hawaii includes:

* * * any means or method or any agent, either tangible or intangible, for the treatment of disease in the human subject.

The language of the statute of Idaho, in defining the scope of the act, is not as clear as it should be, but according to my construction of it it includes only (as every statute of this kind should) medical or surgical practitioners.

In the State of Illinois this exemping clause is found in the statute:

Nothing in this act applies to * * * any person who administers to or treats the sick or suffering by mental or spiritual means without the use of any drug or material remedy.

In Indiana there is no exemption and—

* * * to heal, cure, or relieve, or to attempt to heal, cure, or relieve, those suffering from injury, or deformity, or disease of mind or body—

Is included in the term "practice of medicine" within the meaning of the act.

In Iowa there is no exemption, and it is provided in the act that—

Anyone is regarded as a physician who publicly professes to be a physician, surgeon, or obstetrician and assumes the duties thereof, or who makes a practice of prescribing and furnishing medicine for the sick, or who publicly professes to cure or heal.

In Kansas the exempting clause is as follows:

Nothing in this act shall be construed as interfering with any religious beliefs in the treatment of disease: Provided, That quarantine regulations relating to contagious diseases are not infringed on.

In Kentucky the definition of the act includes persons who shall—treat or attempt to treat any sick or afflicted person by any system or method whatsoever for reward or compensation, or to announce to the public in any way a readiness to treat the sick or afflicted.

But Christian Scientists are excepted by name.

In Louisiana there is this exemption:

Nothing in this act, however, shall be construed to prohibit the practice of the religious tenets of any church whatsoever.

In Maine Christian Scientists and osteopaths are expressly exempted from the terms of the act, together with—any other method of healing, if no poisonous or dangerous drugs are employed nor surgical operations performed.

In the State of Maryland the medical boards certainly have full control, for it is provided in express terms that Christian Scientists are not exempted from the terms of the statute.

In Michigan no exemption is made, and the act is made to include all persons who—attempt to diagnose, cure, or relieve any human disease, ailment, defect, or complaint, whether of physical or mental origin, by attendance or by advice, or by prescribing or furnishing any drug, medicine, appliance, manipulation, or method, or by any therapeutic agent whatsoever.

There is no exemption in Minnesota, and the defining clause of the statute includes any—agency for the treatment, care, or relief of any wound, fracture, or bodily injury, infirmity, or disease.

In Mississippi there is no exemption and no definition of the meaning of the terms of the act, in which case, of course, Christian Scientists are exempted because they are not practicing medicine.

In Missouri there is no exemption, and the definition includes—

* * * any person attempting to treat the sick or others afflicted with bodily or mental infirmities.

I shall come to the State of Missouri a little further along and disclose to the Senate the extent to which the board of health of the city of St. Louis has gone in attempting to suppress the practice of Christian Science under this statute.

There is no exemption in the State of Montana, and the act is made to apply to any—agency, whether material or not material, for the cure, relief, or palliation of any ailment or disease of the mind or body, or for the cure or relief of any wound, fracture, or bodily injury or other deformity, after having received, or with the intention of receiving, therefor, either directly or indirectly, any bonus, gift, or compensation.

In a number of the States the right to practice Christian Science is made to turn upon the question of compensation. It was conceived that a law absolutely forbidding Christian Scientists to heal disease would be unconstitutional, and in order to avoid that contingency it was believed that they might be prevented from practicing by forbidding them to receive any compensation for their services. In that the legislatures and the doctors who procured this kind of legislation have been greatly mistaken. Christian Scientists do not practice the healing for money alone, and the practice of healing by them is gradually and steadily increasing in all of the States where this unjust provision has been made by law.

In Nebraska the law contains no exemption, and has this provision defining the scope of the act:

Any person shall be regarded as practicing medicine who shall operate or profess to heal or prescribe for or otherwise treat any physical or mental ailment of another.

The statute in the State of Nevada contains the provision above mentioned in the State of Montana, and almost in the exact language.

In the New Jersey statute the language is peculiar. There is no exemption affecting this question, and this provision is inserted in the definition clause:

The act applies to all persons professing and attempting to cure diseases by means of the so-called systems of "faith curism," "mind healing," "laying on of hands," and other similar systems.

I do not know whether or not the distinguished lawmakers of the State of New Jersey understood that Christian Scientists would be included in that category. Certainly they would not place themselves there. So far as I know, the courts of that State have not been called upon to determine what is included in that definition.

In the provision in the New Mexico statute, in defining the words "practice of medicine," the language is precisely the same as I have stated for Montana and Nevada.

In New York this clause is inserted in the definition of the practice of medicine: Anyone—who shall either offer or undertake by any means or method to diagnose, treat, operate, or prescribe for any human disease, pain, injury, deformity, or physical condition.

North Carolina has no definition and therefore does not affect the rights of Christian Scientists.

In Ohio the defining clause is made to include any person who administers—treatment of whatever nature for the cure or relief of a wound, fracture, or bodily injury, infirmity, or disease—for a compensation.

This clause in the Ohio statute has been construed by the courts to apply to Christian Scientists, and they are positively forbidden in that State to practice healing for a consideration.

In Oklahoma the defining clause limits the operation of the statute to the practice of medicine and surgery in the proper sense of those terms, and therefore does not prohibit other modes of healing.

The State of Oregon may be regarded as in the same condition, except that the language of the defining clause of the statute is somewhat ambiguous and uncertain.

In Pennsylvania, again, there is no defining clause.

The statute of the Philippine Islands is made to apply to anyone who shall "treat" any person for any ailment.

In Porto Rico the language of the statute is almost precisely the same as that of Montana and Nevada.

The State of Rhode Island has a reasonable and proper definition of the practice of medicine and surgery, and does not prohibit other modes of healing.

The language of the South Carolina statute is the same as that of the Philippine Islands.

The statute of Tennessee is made to apply to anyone who "treats or professes to treat" any person for any physical ailment, the same as in the Philippines and Porto Rico.

The statute of Texas provides that there shall be no discrimination against any school of medicine nor apply to masseurs practicing massage and provides in the defining clause that—

Any person shall be regarded as practicing medicine who shall * * * treat or offer to treat any disease or disorder, mental or physical deformity, or injury by any system or method or to effect cures thereof and charge therefor, directly or indirectly, money or other compensation.

This is another of the statutes which makes the right to practice Christian Science depend upon the charging of a compensation.

The State of Utah has this provision in the exempting clause:

This act does not prohibit * * * those healing by spiritual means without pretending to have a knowledge of medicine.

In Vermont there is no exemption, and the act is made by the defining clause to apply to all persons who—prescribe, direct, recommend, or advise, give or sell for the use of any person any drug, medicine, or other agency or application for the treatment, cure, or relief of any bodily injury, infirmity, or disease, or who follows the occupation of treating disease by any system or method.

The defining clause in the statute of Virginia makes the statute apply to persons who—cure or relieve those suffering from injury or deformity, or disease of mind or body, or advertise or announce to the public in any manner a readiness or ability to heal, cure, or relieve those who may be suffering from injury or deformity or disease of mind or body.

The exemption clause is as follows:

Nothing in this act shall be construed to affect or to limit the practice of the religious tenents of any church in the ministration of the sick or suffering by mental or spiritual means without the use of any drug or material remedy, whether gratuitously or for compensation, provided sanitary laws are complied with.

The exemption clause in the statute of Washington includes the following:

Nor is the act "to discriminate against any particular school of medicine or surgery or osteopathy, or any system or mode of treating the sick or afflicted, nor to interfere in any way with the practice of religion."

The defining clause of the statute of West Virginia confines the effect of the act to the practice of medicine, as every such act should in justice be confined.

The statute of Wisconsin is in like condition.

There is no exemption in the statute of the State of Wyoming and the defining clause contains the following:

Any person is regarded as practicing medicine who in any manner holds himself out to the public as being engaged in the diagnosis and treatment of diseases or injuries or deformities of human beings, or who suggests, recommends, or prescribes any form of treatment for the intended palliation, relief, or cure of any physical or mental ailment of any person, with the intention of receiving therefor, either directly or indirectly, any fee, gift, or compensation.

Another of the statutes turning upon the question of charging for services rendered.

The statutes containing these various peculiar provisions, especially those bringing within the terms of the statutes for the regulation of the practice of medicine and surgery all persons who are healing disease by altogether different means and without the use of medicines or surgery, show the extent to which the American Medical Association has gone in attempting to hold in the hands of its own profession and school of medicine the treatment of disease, and how obliging the legislatures of the different States have been in giving false definitions of the practice of medicine and surgery in aid of this effort on their part. If these unjust and, in many cases, unconstitutional statutes should be enforced Christian Scientists would be in many of the States absolutely prohibited from any attempt to heal disease or alleviate suffering in any form; but, fortunately, the people of this country are more enlightened, intelligent, and tolerant than the doctors or their legislators in many cases. The doctors have made the most strenuous efforts to enforce these statutes in various States. Their efforts have usually been failures. Generally jurors will not convict in such cases, even if the statute has been violated, as the beneficent work of Christian Science has become so well known throughout the country, resulting in the healing of thousands of people after the doctors had given them up as incurable, and has convinced pretty much everybody except the doctors, whose selfish interests are involved, that they are doing a work which should be commended by all good citizens instead of making it a criminal offense to exercise their right of healing.

I am going to trouble the Senate now for a time by showing just what has been done in some cases by the medical practitioners in attempting to enforce these prohibitory statutes which they themselves have brought about for selfish purposes in the prosecution, even persecution, of those who have conscientiously endeavored to heal disease and alleviate suffering by means in which they thoroughly believe and which have been eminently successful.

I can give only a very few of these cases, as time will not permit me to go into many of them. If I could bring before the Senate of the United States all of the cases of persecution that have grown up under the prohibitive statutes which I have called to its attention it would arouse the just indignation of every Member of this body.

I now call attention to one case which is in point. I have called to the attention of the Senate the provisions in the statute of the State of Missouri which makes it a penal offense for any person to attempt to treat the sick or those afflicted with bodily or mental infirmities unless they have procured a license to practice medicine or surgery from the board of health, authorized by the statute to issue such licenses. Of course, Christian Scientists can not procure a license from a medical board of examiners or board of health, because they are neither medical practitioners nor surgeons. Therefore, under this statute, every person who ministers to the sick or injured without such a license is made subject to a penalty.

Bertha Reichenbecher was a Christian Science practitioner and a reader in one of the churches in the city of St. Louis. She was urgently requested to attend a man who falsely claimed to be seriously ill. She responded to the call and accepted a fee of $1 that was pressed upon her by the alleged patient. The man was a decoy of the health department of the city, who pretended to be ill in order to detect Miss Reichenbecher in the act of practicing Christian Science healing. The bill he gave her was marked. Officers were waiting for her at the door and arrested her for the alleged offense and took her to the police station and treated her throughout with unnecessary indignities. But I shall let Miss Reichenbecher give the particulars of the occurrence. She has made a succinct statement of the whole matter in a sworn affidavit, which is as follows:

STATE OF MISSOURI, City of St. Louis, ss:

Personally appeared before the undersigned, a notary public within and for the said city of St. Louis, Bertha Reichenbecher, who, being duly sworn on oath, deposes and says, viz:

"My name is Bertha Reichenbecher; am 45 years of age, and unmarried. I reside at No. 1726 Oregon Avenue in the said city of St. Louis, where I keep house with my mother, who is now 91 years of age. I have been a member of local Christian Science churches for the past 12 years. I am now a member and the second reader of Third Church of Christ, Scientist, in St. Louis, and have been a member of the First Church of Christ, Scientist, of Boston, Mass., since 1907; am also a Christian Science practitioner, and have been for two years past.

"On Friday, December 15, 1911, a young woman, giving her name as Hazel Miller, applied to me at my home for Christian Science treatment, saying that she had obtained my name from another Christian Scientist and that she has also heard me read in the Christian Science Church. I gave her a treatment, and she requested me to call the next morning to see her brother, who, she said, was confined to the house with Bright's disease. She gave her residence as No. 2118 Oregon Avenue. There was nothing said by either of us about payment for the treatment. The next morning at 11.15 I called at that address and found the young man lying on a couch, covered, and with a bottle of medicine and a pipe on a chair beside him. After a short talk I gave him treatment and arranged that he should call at my home the following Monday, as he had arranged for a week's treatment. I had started for the door when he called me back and insisted that his 'sister' pay me for the treatment. I asked them to wait until I was through with the case, but he insisted that I accept payment then for the treatment given. They paid me $1, and I departed. Upon reaching the corner of Oregon and Russell Avenue, a man stood facing me, who bowed as I approached, and said, 'You are Miss Reichenbecher?' I replied, 'Yes,' and shook hands with him, thinking he was some one I had met and whose name I could not recall. He said, 'My name is Coats; I am an officer of the law, and must arrest you for practicing Christian Science without a license.' I asked if he had been watching my house. He replied, 'We do not give away our methods.' I then said that I could not understand why they should entrap me in this way, when they might go and find Christian Science practitioners in their offices all over the city. He made no reply. I asked permission to go to my home, a little over a block away, and inform my mother, who is 91 years old, that I would be away for a little while; but he would not permit me, saying that I could use both telephones when I reached the station. We then took the Tower Grove car to the central station, and he reported to Acting Sergt. Singleton. I telephoned to Mr. John Ashcroft that I had been placed under arrest. It was 12.30, as near as I can remember, when we arrived at the station. I told them that my bondsman and attorney would be there as quickly as possible. After giving my name, etc., Officer Coats, who arrested me, escorted me to the second floor and I was turned over to the matron. There was some woman present who had slept there several nights, having been under arrest, to whom the matron said in sharp, impatient tone, as I entered, 'Turn your back.' She then said to me in the same tone, 'Take off your things.' I said, 'Why? Shall I have to wait long? I am waiting for my bondsman and attorney.' She said, 'You will probably be here some little time.' She then said, 'Take off your hat.' When I did so, she took it and untied the lining; felt all over the hat, inside and out; and requested me to take off my coat. She emptied my pockets, and asked whether there were only two pockets in the coat, after shaking the same. She then said, 'Put down your bag; now take off your waist.' I said, 'Why, do you mean to search me?' She replied, 'Yes.' I grew red, I know, and said, 'Why, I am not arrested for theft; do you know what I am arrested for?' She said, 'Yes; we have had lots of your kind, and we have to take these measures to get rid of them.' I remarked, 'I have been arrested for practicing Christian Science without a license.' She said, 'I know—drop your skirts.' I stood but 3 or 4 feet from a door which contained a glass panel, across which a narrow towel had been stretched, leaving some inches of the glass exposed at the top. I turned, and said, 'Why, look; I can see those men's heads.' She said, 'That don't matter; they can't see anything.' I reiterated at different times, 'This is awful, to be compelled to be searched as though I had committed a theft'; and I remarked that Miss Dyer had been arrested several weeks before, and I asked whether she had been subjected to this ordeal. She said she did not remember; she supposed so. She requested me to unfasten my garters and remove my corsets, which article she carefully searched, and she then told me to take off my shoes and turn down my stockings to the feet. This left me with nothing but my undergarments on, and she felt carefully over my entire body and also through my hair. While she searched I could also hear the voice of Mr. Priesmeyer, my bondsman, talking in the next room.

"During our conversation I asked the matron if she knew anything about Christian Science, and she said very little; that one lady at one time gave her a rather intelligent answer to the question as to what Christian Science was; and she asked me what Christian Science was. I said, 'Prayer, and keeping the heart close to God.'

"After dressing, she asked me to count out the money in my purse, laying dollars together, and to turn out everything that was in it. There was $12.86 in the purse. My bag or purse was then handed to the two men in the next room (Coats and Lawrence), and, as the door was opened a number of times while I was in there, I saw them counting the money and going through the contents of my bag. These men put my money in an envelope and marked it '11.86.' I did not know until I saw the statement in the newspaper two days later that they had taken the marked dollar bill, which Lawrence had given me, out of my purse, nor did I know that the dollar was marked.

"While the matron did not handle me roughly, she treated me in exactly the same manner she would have exercised with any criminal who was turned over to her. While I did not resist physically, I certainly made strong protests against being subjected to the search. I treated her with the courtesy with which I treat everyone, and when I left I said 'good-day' to her, as I did not blame her for the treatment I had received, since she assured me she was only carrying out orders.

"Later, when I was permitted to go into the next room, there was another man who required me to sign my name in a book, and he escorted me to the room downstairs where my bag had been left, and there it was turned over to me.

"BERTHA REICHENBECHER."

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 15th day of January, 1912. My commission expires May 30, 1914.

[SEAL.] OLIVER FRAZIER.
Notary Public, City of St. Louis, Mo.

This disgraceful proceeding aroused the indignation of the good people of St. Louis. The prosecuting attorney denounced the proceeding as a "frame-up" and refused to prosecute the case. The newspapers, including some medical journals, denounced the proceedings in unmeasured terms. One of the newspapers of the city, after giving a full account of the affair and commenting severely upon the conduct of the board of health, had this further to say:

PHYSICIAN DENOUNCES COMMISSIONER.

The next step in protest against municipal and medical tyranny was taken a few days later when Dr. Paul Fletcher, a member of the city council and a prominent doctor, introduced resolutions in the council condemning the action of Dr. Starkloff in gathering evidence. The council defeated the resolutions. Dr. Fletcher defined his position as follows:

"The health commissioner has caused employees to faint, and the methods are repugnant to many of our esteemed citizens; it is a travesty on the law and subversive of right and justice. It is wrong to put a woman in jail who has committed no crime. I am a physician, but if our law officers are compelled to resort to such methods it is time to rise up in protest.

The opposition of medical journals to Christian Science was clearly shown, but it is some consolation that some of them denounced this proceeding and declared for common decency in the treatment of such cases. I wish this might be said of the doctors who usually deal with matters of this kind. They are trying to enforce such prohibitory laws rigorously and without mercy with the hope of suppressing such treatment of disease entirely. It is a hopeless task as well as a brutal attempt to deprive thousands of our people of the right to resort to the remedy of their own choice for relief from disease. If the teachings of Christian Science are false, if the principle of healing its people believe in is not true and their pretensions a fake, Christian Science will not survive. If it is the truth it will prevail, and no restrictive or prohibitory laws nor any amount of persecution can overthrow it or force them to forego their right and their religious duty to heal the sick. They believe, and I concur in that belief, that any law that forbids or interferes with this right and duty is in violation of the Constitution of the United States and should be treated accordingly. I shall come to this question further along.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered. If the Senator from California will withhold for a moment, the Chair will lay before the Senate sundry messages from the House of Representatives.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

HEIGHT OF BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the request of the House of Representatives to be furnished with a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 2224) to amend "An act to regulate the height of buildings in the District of Columbia," approved June 1, 1910, the bill having been lost or mislaid, and by unanimous consent the request was ordered to be complied with.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5624) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, which was, on page 7, to strike out lines 7 to 10, inclusive.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Chair state to what item the amendment refers?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Trimble case.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate disagree to the House amendment, ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the Presiding Officer appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. BURNHAM, Mr. BRADLEY, and Mr. POMERENE conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4623) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, which was, on page 5, line 11, to strike out "Slightain" and insert "Slightam."

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5194) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, which were, on page 2, to strike out lines 9 to 17, inclusive, and, on page 3, to strike out lines 9 to 12, inclusive.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5670) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, which was, on page 13, to strike out lines 5 to 8, inclusive.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5045) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, which were, on page 23, to strike out lines 21 to 24, inclusive, and on page 32 to strike out lines 10 to 13, inclusive.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 16493. A bill to correct the military record of William Z. Norman was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

H. R. 23063. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and to certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 23515. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and to certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 23557. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 23765. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY ON OCEAN STEAMERS.

Mr. BOURNE. Out of order, I should like to report from the Committee on Commerce the bill (S. 3815) to amend an act entitled "An act to require apparatus and operators for radio-communication on certain ocean steamers," approved June 24, 1910, and to ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. BACON. I would have no objection in the world to that being done if it were not in violation of the positive rule of the Senate, and we ought not to have a rule unless we are going to enforce it. It is the duty of the Chair, even without any suggestion from the floor, to enforce that rule. The rule was adopted to correct a very great evil.

Mr. LODGE. The rule makes it the duty of the Chair to enforce it without attention being called to it.

Mr. BOURNE. Then I ask that the bill may go on the calendar.

Mr. BACON. No; I must object. The Senator can not offer it for any purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The Senator from California will proceed.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH.

Mr. WORKS. I desire to take up one or two other cases of prosecution under the prohibitory or restrictive State statutes. The following newspaper account of conditions in New York is interesting:

ARRESTS IN NEW YORK—CASE AGAINST MRS. MOSBACH RESULTS IN ACQUITTAL—GRAND JURY REFUSES TO INDICT ONE MAN.

The status of the "irregular" practitioner in New York City is still an unknown quantity. The latest case that has come up is that of Mrs. Margaret Mosbach, whose daughter, Kathryn, was found by the coroner to have died on November 30, 1911, of diphtheria, under treatment by a Christian Science practitioner, Mrs. Marie Roberts, of the Bronx. On January 5 a coroner's jury, containing many of the most prominent men of the Bronx, acquitted Mrs. Mosbach of willful neglect in failing to call a physician for her daughter. The verdict of the jury raised the question of needed legislation to prevent occurrence of such cases.

WHY NOT ARREST DOCTORS, TOO?

Mr. Virgil O. Strickler, former first reader of the First Church of Christ, Scientist, New York, commented on the Mosbach case in a lecture. Mr. Strickler said that the New York World had published a list of 32 children who had died under Christian Science treatment during the last 13 years. The newspapers always publish such cases in glaring headlines, he said, but the people's attention was not called to cases proving fatal under regular physicians. Against 1,715 deaths in New York alone from diphtheria during 1910 of young children under care of doctors, only 10 from that cause had occurred in 13 years under Christian Science treatment over the entire Nation. "Really," he concluded, "in all fairness, why should not the doctors be arrested for allowing these children to die under their treatment, the same as a Christian Science practitioner is arrested when one patient dies from the same disease under her treatment?"

GRAND JURY REFUSES INDICTMENT.

This recent case recalls the arrest about a year ago of Willis V. Cole, Byron W. Winslow, and Julius Benjamin, Christian Scientists, after the machinations of a woman detective who feigned illness and asked them for treatment. They were held for the court of special sessions, but had the trials transferred to the court of general sessions. This gave the grand jury an opportunity to pass upon the merits of the cases, and the grand jury investigating Mr. Winslow's case refused to indict. The cases of Cole and Benjamin are still pending, and will probably be made test cases to decide the rights of unlicensed practitioners.

Mrs. Mosbach was charged with neglect in trusting to Christian Science treatment in case of her daughter who died of diphtheria and not calling a doctor. It is quite a common thing to censure anyone who fails to call a doctor where death ensues. If a doctor is called and the patient dies no one is to blame. If a doctor loses a patient it is called a misfortune. The same thing if a Christian Scientist is the attendant is a crime.

This further account of the New York situation is from the New York World:

WHY NOT ARREST DOCTORS WHEN PATIENTS DIE? (VIRGIL O. STICKLER)—THERE WERE 1,715 DIPHTHERIA DEATHS IN CITY IN 1910—UNDER "SCIENCE" TREATMENT 1 IN 13 YEARS—FIRST READER QUOTES FROM VITAL STATISTICS—PROTESTS AGAINST ADVOCATES OF THE DRUGGING SYSTEM ATTEMPTING TO DICTATE.

When the World published two weeks ago a list of 32 children who had died of diphtheria and other diseases during the last 13 years while being treated by Christian Science practitioners it moved Virgil O. Strickler, the first reader of the First Church of Christ, Scientist, Ninety-sixth Street and Central Park West, to compile a few statistics from the vital records of the city to set against the list. This is his response as he made it when lecturing to the Sixth Church of Christ, Scientist, in Lexington Hall, No. 158 East Fifty-eighth Street, Tuesday night.

Many people do not understand why Christian Scientists have more faith in Christian Science treatment than they have in drugs. The reason is very plain, said Mr. Strickler. They get better results under Christian Science than they formerly obtained under the drugging system.

The World published on Sunday the names of 32 children who, it claimed, had died under Christian Science treatment in the United States during the past 13 years. Whenever a person, and especially a child, dies under Christian Science treatment the fact is published under glaring headlines in the papers, and as a rule somebody is arrested. It is safe therefore to assume that the list published contained the names of all the children who have died under Christian Science treatment during the last 13 years.

In the published list of names 10 are said to have died from diphtheria, 5 from pneumonia and bronchial pneumonia, 2 from scarlet fever, and the remainder from a variety of causes.

WHAT NEW YORK RECORDS SHOW.

I hold in my hand an official report of the department of health of the city of New York for the year 1910, which shows that during the last year there were 1,715 deaths from diphtheria, nearly all children under 15 under the care of doctors in this city alone, as against 10 deaths from the same cause under Christian Science practice in the entire United States in 13 years. Of these 10 cases, only 1 was in New York City.

The official report also shows that there were 953 deaths in the city last year from scarlet fever under medical treatment, nearly all of which were children, as against 2 in the entire United States in 13 years under Christian Science treatment, and not one of those was in this city.

The results in pneumonia and bronchial pneumonia are even more startling. The official report shows that 10,519 people died in the city of New York alone last year from these diseases under medical treatment, more than 50 per cent of whom were children under 15 years of age, as against 5 per cent in the entire United States under Christian Science treatment in 13 years.

The report of the board of health also shows that 27,111 children under the age of 15 years died from all causes under medical treatment in the city of New York last year, as against 32 who are shown by the published list to have died under Christian Science treatment in the United States in 13 years.

WHY NOT ARREST DOCTORS?

These facts show why Christian Science parents have more faith in Christian Science than in drugs for themselves and their families. If any school of medicine could guarantee cures, it would not be necessary to arrest people in order to compel them to employ doctors of that school.

Why do the newspapers call attention in a spectacular way to the death of one child in New York City in 13 years under Christian Science treatment from diphtheria, when more than 1,500 children under the age of 15 years died last year in the city from the same disease under medical treatment without the newspapers saying a single word about the failure of the doctors?

Really, in all fairness, why should not the doctors be arrested for allowing these 1,500 children to die from diphtheria under their treatment, the same as a Christian Science practitioner is arrested when one patient dies from the same disease under her treatment? Or why not arrest the mothers of these 1,500 children for employing doctors who allowed their children to die, the same as to arrest the mother of the one child who employed a Christian Science practitioner?

Mr. President, Christian Scientists do not claim to be perfect. They do not claim to heal in all cases. But they do claim that they have a much larger proportion of cures than the medical practitioners, and that, too, while their patients are very largely composed of persons who are afflicted with so-called incurable diseases, and who have been given up as incurable by the doctors. They do not believe there are any incurable diseases. They have proved it by healing thousands of diseases classed as incurable, and which the doctors admit they can not heal, many of them being cases that the doctors have actually given up as hopeless. They do not ask any favors of Congress or any other lawmaking power to sustain their position as healers of disease. They are willing to stand upon their merits, as shown by their works. They are willing to be judged by their fruits. What they do insist upon is that laws shall not be passed or enforced that will deprive them of the right to heal disease or put them within the power of the doctors, most of whom are their common enemies, for selfish reasons. They are kept constantly on the alert to meet the unwarranted efforts of the American Medical Association to procure legislation that shall make every act of theirs in aid of the sick and afflicted a crime and forbid them from healing disease. They have not always been successful. As I have already pointed out, there are many legislative acts in the States that have this effect, and which are wholly unjust and oppressive.

With respect to the acts of coercion urged by the doctors, with unjust laws as their weapons, the Business Farmer, published at El Paso, Tex., makes editorially this very pertinent comment:

"WHERE ART THOU?

"And there was war in heaven; Michael and his angels fought against the dragon."

The whole world has become a stupendous battle field, whereon is being waged the grandest battle ever witnessed by mankind. The superficial observer reads about the overthrowing of the long-established monarchical Government of Portugal, the revolution in medieval China, the barbarous war between Italy and Turkey, the seething turmoil in Mexico, and the strike and strivings of our country, and wonders—what's next.

The close student of the times, looking beneath the surfaces, recognizes the great universal issue at stake. He sees the battle of Armageddon being repeated on a world-wide battle field. He sees all the seeming powers of evil marshaled against the oncoming armies of truth. He sees on one hand the believers in the universality of the brotherhood of man, and on the other the cohorts of special privileges. He sees the desperate efforts being made by evil and selfishness and greed to ensnare and enslave man, "made in the image and likeness of God," and bind him shackled and helpless to the chariot of Greed's own aggrandizement.

But universal man is slowly but surely learning of his birthright—is learning to know that he was not made to slave and toil and starve, that bestial power might sit in gilded palaces and trample on every right, human and divine.

One of the boldest and most audacious demands of the special-privilege-seeking class that has been witnessed in this country is evidenced in the efforts being made by the American Medical Association to foster on the people of this country one of the most iniquitous laws ever attempted to be fastened on a free people. In order to secure exclusive privileges, and in flagrant violation of the rights of other schools of medicine, it seeks and, to accomplish its ends, is carrying on a most heartless, cruel, and diabolical campaign. It seeks to inoculate the mind of the people with fear and terror. It is constantly sounding the tocsin of alarm, conjuring up new diseases to frighten and terrorize the community, and then demanding added powers to combat the product of its own excited imagination.

The following communication to the Ohio State Journal shows the oppressive measures to which the doctors have resorted in Ohio:

ARREST OF SCIENCE HEALERS.

Two years ago a timid maiden lady who happened to be practicing a method of healing which required no medicine whatever was summoned before the State medical board and told in language both uncivil and severe, if not harsh and cruel, that if it ever heard of her healing anyone by her method it would arrest her, and the frightened girl has obeyed. Remember this threat was against the practice of medicine without license, which she had never thought of doing and knew not how to do.

Permit me to cite another outrage from the same official quarter: Late Friday night two officers appeared at two residences on the East Side and, compelling two ladies to enter a patrol wagon, hurried them off to the West Side on a charge of trying to heal the sick without medicine and without the paid consent of the medical board. The evident design and hope of the planners of this late-at-night arrest was to terrify and mortify the lone ladies, who had for months kept a cancer-afflicted patient from the surgeon's knife and thus cheated him out of a case, if not a fee. As it was, the ladies had to wait at the station until husband, friend, and attorney came to release them under bond, thus defeating the design to punish the ladies by a night in jail.

Now, the ends of the law, if merciful, could have been met in broad daylight, between 9 a. m. and 5 p. m., but that would not have served the aim. Even if the medical board is a legal department of State, some of its officers are not commending it to public favor, but, rather, inviting comparison with the monarchical methods of Europe, China, and Japan. (Reform, Columbus, Nov. 25.)

WHY THE AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION WANTS THIS BILL PASSED.

The American Medical Association is using every effort to maintain and increase its power. To this end it has spent years of time and thousands of dollars in the effort to establish a national medicine with one of their schools of medicine at its head. The Senate can readily see by what I have already shown of their efforts to enforce the existing laws how that power would be used against every other school and mode of healing. They have organized for the campaign in the most effective way. The association passed the following resolution, offered by Dr. McCormack:

Resolved, That the president be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint a committee of seven members, which shall be charged with the duty of framing a bill for a national department of health, to be presented to the next session of Congress in December, and that this committee shall consider and determine all matters and policies relating to national health legislation, and may invite the cooperation and cooperate with other organizations having the same purpose in view.

Prof. Irving Fisher, chairman of the committee of one hundred, largely composed of allopathic or "regular" doctors, has this to say on the subject:

Our legislative subcommittee and executive subcommittee have held frequent meetings. We believe that it is not possible to overcome the opposition unless a campaign fund of from $20,000 to $25,000 can be raised at once. This will be used for printing, stationery, telegrams, etc., the effect of which will be that Congressmen, especially pivotal Congressmen, will not dare to displease their constituents by opposing President Taft's program. It will also be used to reach our American Health League—which contains many thousand health enthusiasts—to start up our Authors' League of 1,000 health writers, to stimulate our press council of 100 leading editors, and to supply them and the members generally with ammunition in the way of literature; also to reach the labor organizations and the Grange and all our allies. * * *

I am writing to you among the first, knowing that you keenly appreciate the importance of overcoming the selfish opposition to a project which, once started, will surely expand within a decade so that millions upon millions of Government money will be put into this most needed form of national defense.

Letters received from Congressmen in response to our effort to poll them on this question show that many of them, and especially those who control procedure, need something more than the President's message to urge them to action; in short, that they must have letters and telegrams from their constituents.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume the Senator from California is aware of the fact—but I think it ought to go into the RECORD—that Prof. Fisher is not a physician.

Mr. WORKS. Oh, yes; I am aware of that.

Mr. GALLINGER. He is merely a professor of economics, or something of that kind. He took up this propaganda—I do not know what his purpose was—and has undertaken to push it over the country. I never approved of it, and told him so very plainly.

Mr. WORKS. I had stated on another occasion, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire, that I regard the efforts of Prof. Fisher as entirely sincere.

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WORKS. But he is not a physician.

The reference to President Taft's program in this communication was purely gratuitous. The President had no such program as they were attempting to carry out. On the contrary, he was opposed to the bill and so informed its friends. He was opposed to creating a medical department and they were so informed. What he did recommend was the bringing together of the present medical bureaus under one management, giving as a reason that it would be more economical as well as more efficient, and nothing more. They are accepting this bill in its present form because they must, but with the fixed purpose of adding to it when they can until they have gotten all they started out to get.

Now, Mr. President, let us see what they are seeking to accomplish. There is no limit to their ambition and selfish desires in this respect, as I shall show by their own declarations.

The following resolution of the American Medical Association, adopted by its committee on medical legislation during its session at the Holland House, in New York City, in June, 1903, will tend to show the extent to which they are willing to go and the means they will use to accomplish results:

Resolved (4). It shall be the duty of each member of the national auxiliary congressional and legislative committee to bring all and only such matters of pending legislation as may be referred to him, either by the legislative committee of his respective State or Territorial medical association, or by the committee on medical legislation of the American Medical Association, to the attention of the medical profession and the people of his respective county, and by every honorable means, personal and political, individual and professional, private and public, direct and indirect, secure desired action thereon by his representatives in both branches, as the case may be, of the State legislature, or of the Congress of the United States. And it shall be his further duty promptly to report all such efforts on his part, first, relative to State legislation, to the chairman of the committee on legislation of his State medical association; and, secondly, relative to national legislation, to the chairman of the committee on medical legislation of the American Medical Association.

Resolved, That the chairman of committee on medical legislation of the American Medical Association is hereby directed (a) to procure from the president of each State and Territorial medical association nominations for such national auxiliary congressional and legislative committee, (b) to formulate a list of the chief executive and legislative officers of the United States Government and of the government of each State and Territory, (c) to collate necessary information relative to the executive and legislative departments of the American Medical Association and of each State and Territorial medical association, (d) to formulate a list of the officers of each State and Territorial board of health and medical licensing board, and (e) to secure a brief summary of proposed legislation, State and national. And he is further directed to arrange the information thus collected into a congressional and legislative directory of the American Medical Association.

Dr. Samuel Dixon, of Pennsylvania, in a paper entitled "Law the Foundation of State Medicine," published in the journal of the association, said:

Compulsion, not persuasion, is the keynote of State medicine. Let it be understood that no matter how great efforts we may make to educate the people, unless we have the lex scripta—the written law—to fall back on, State medicine, while it may be a beautiful science, can never be a practical art. * * * The great majority of mankind are neither wise enough voluntarily to submit themselves to the requirements of sanitary law for the sake of preserving their own health and that of their loved ones, or righteous enough to be willing to exercise self-denial and repress the cravings of avarice to save others from sickness, suffering, and death. * * * But the law we must have. These laws must reach into all the relations of life. * * *

Thus we have a State system of sanitary administration, complete and symmetrical; its head at the seat of power in the State, untrammeled in the exercise of authority, reaching down through the subdivisions of county and township to the people, and a department in daily touch with every nook and corner of the State through its faithful allies, the physicians of the Commonwealth.

The following from an article by Henry R. Strong, of St. Louis, shows fairly well the workings of the American Medical Association:

THE ATTEMPT OF THE AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION TO ENLIST LEGISLATIVE AID IN FAVOR OF ITS MONOPOLISTIC SCHEMES.

Finally, in the last few years, the association, following the example of other corporations in the gradual forging of its monopolistic bonds, has essayed to influence the legislative and administrative branches of State and National Government in favor of its schemes, and has recently gone openly into politics for that purpose. To be sure, it still shouts its old-time slogan of "the public weal," but in this case it makes the thinnest kind of disguise of its real motives and openly boasts that it has already made the power of medicine felt in legislative halls, so that whereas legislators formerly kept the representatives of the association dancing attendance upon them for anything they wanted now these same legislators dance attendance upon the association's delegates.

Said Dr. C. A. L. Reed, chairman of the legislative committee and late candidate for the United States Senate, in a speech at Chicago during the recent meeting of the association:

"When a committee of the American Medical Association went to the Fifty-eighth Congress, their legislative committee said, 'Can't you boil down what you have to say into 20 minutes?' Dr. Reed said, 'There were in that Congress one doctor in the Senate and none in the House.' * * *

"In the Sixtieth Congress there were five doctors, all told, and because of the same influence we simply went to the Willard Hotel and sent for Congressmen to come to us, and they came. * * * In the next Congress I have every reason to believe there will be 25 physicians."

According to Dr. Reed, it is only by representation in Congress, which he described as being at present 'water-logged with lawyers,' that the association could hope to see its will translated into law.

Like every powerful corporation, the American Medical Association has a legislative fund. Probably like every other corporation it has really two legislative funds, one open to public scrutiny and the other known only to the powers that be. The Journal of the American Medical Association of May 23, 1908, tells of annual expenses for "medical legislation" (whatever that may mean) of $2,573.22. It can hardly be, however, that this represents all the money spent in furthering its legislative and political schemes, for the committee on legislation, of which Dr. C. A. L. Reed was chairman, in its report to the convention in 1905 stated:

"It has secured a list of local political leaders of every organized and recognized political party in the United States. The list already embraces the names of several political managers in each of 900 counties, the entire list aggregating in excess of 11,000 names. Through this list the central committee is in position to bring questions of pending legislation to the serious and thoughtful consideration of the men who, in their respective localities, exercise a preponderating influence in determining political action. * * * The political list is arranged so that the dominant politics of each county and of each congressional district is indicated, as well as the political affiliations of each member whose name appears on the list. It thus happens that we are able to move with a certain degree of accuracy in invoking political influence in behalf of such measures as are taken up by your committee. This list will be kept alive by asking for revisions from time to time, especially after each general election, and will, we are sure, prove to be an effective medium of action in the agitations which are pending in the immediate future."

In June, 1907, it was announced by Dr. Reed that the association had an emissary in each of the 2,830 counties of the country, and that the list of political leaders had been increased to 16,000, to whom circulars are sent, the purpose being, according to Dr. Reed, "to educate them on proposed or pending legislation in which the medical profession is interested." All of which shows that the American Medical Association leaders have not been idle and that they are not novices in politics.

If this kind of work is being kept up, it must certainly require more than the paltry sum specified in the Journal's report to sustain it.

Mr. President, the doctors in all their efforts to procure restrictive or prohibitive legislation of this kind, proceed upon the theory that they and they alone are competent to deal with questions of health, and that all other people claiming to heal disease are incompetents. Thus it is said by Dr. Henry O. Marcy, former president of the American Medical Association, in speaking of the opposition to this bill:

It is the old cry of the incompetents who practice under various designations against legislation that will tend to bar them from practice and keep the practice in the hands of those who will not be a menace to the public health.

This is a very significant utterance. It assumes that all knowledge in health preservation and healing is in the old school practitioners, and that the purpose of this legislation is intended to bar everyone else. Here is another declaration of a like kind. Dr. C. A. L. Reed, chairman of the legislative committee of the American Medical Association, has this to say:

The principle that is involved is the same—that the man in possession of the technical knowledge which gives him a scientific comprehension of his subject and his problem should have the executive authority to enforce that knowledge and not be overridden by a man who has no such technical knowledge, and consequently no such comprehension of the importance of the subject.

And Prof. J. Pease Norton, of Yale University, in a speech before the American Association for the Advancement of Science, reprinted with approval in the journal of the American Medical Association, pointed out the extent to which the advocates of this kind of legislation proposed to go if Congress should permit it. He says:

1. It seems desirable that a United States national department of health should be established, having as its head a secretary, who shall be a member of the Executive Cabinet.
2. The purpose of the department should be to take all measures calculated, in the judgment of experts, to decrease deaths, to decrease sickness, and to increase physical and mental efficiency of citizens.
3. It should consist of the following bureaus:
National bureau of infant hygiene.
National bureau of education and schools.
National bureau of sanitation.
National bureau of pure food.
National bureau of registration of physicians and surgeons.
National bureau of registration of drugs, druggists, and drug manufacturers.
National bureau of registration of institutions of public and private relief, correction, detention, and residence.
National bureau of organic diseases.
National bureau of quarantine.
National bureau of health information.
National bureau of immigration.
National bureau of labor conditions.
National bureau of research, requiring statistics.
National bureau of research, requiring laboratories and equipment.

This is a pretty broad field that the National Government is expected to enter upon. It is almost without limit.

And when a measure similar to this was before Congress on a hearing before a Senate committee, Dr. Welch, formerly president of the same association, threw out this significant remark to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]:

I would simply like to throw out the suggestion that it may be that the Federal Government can exercise larger powers in this matter than is generally supposed to be the case.

These declarations show authoritatively and clearly what these gentlemen have in view as the final result of legislation of this character and the use they expect to make of it. It is an imposing and far-reaching scheme to bring the entire health activities under the control of this one school of medicine and by the power thus given them to influence and control indirectly, if not directly, the health activities of the several States. But one of the most radical declarations upon this important subject will be found in the magazine, Clinical Medicine, in the issue of April, 1911, as follows:

The inhabitants of each community should be equally divided among the physicians, and these should have no expectation of poaching on their neighbors' preserves. If any increase in pay resulted from such acts they would soon cease. The proportion would be more equally approximated, and every member of the profession would have enough.

It is a grave menace to the liberties of the people in a matter of life and death. I wonder how far the Congress of the United States is willing to be made a party to such a scheme.

Mr. President, I have shown by the declaration of eminent physicians, either now or heretofore connected with the American Medical Association, what their purposes and intentions are in seeking this legislation, and what the people of this country may expect if the powers of the Government are thus given over to them. I want now to call the attention of the Senate to what some other equally distinguished gentlemen have said as to the purpose and effect of legislation of this kind. In an address delivered by Dr. G. Frank Lydston, of the medical department of the State University of Illinois, in speaking of the efforts of the doctors to procure such legislation as I have been calling attention to, he says:

Despotism in medicine is not a theory, it is a condition, one that should alarm all save its direct beneficiaries. No physician can, with equanimity, survey the trend of affairs medical in America unless he has no interest in personal liberty. He has forgotten the high ideals of our medical forefathers. The more speciously masked self-interest is the more dangerous it becomes.

And this extract from the Pacific Coast Journal of Homeopathy:

No citizen objects to Government supervision looking to sanitation, pure water, air, and food but what he finds next is in the invasion of the right and duty of a family physician and of his own personal liberty by health-board doctors. In short, he objects to health boards. He also objects to doctors, and if in private practice he would not call in one to invade his home, dictating medication to him, and imprisoning him if he refuses to submit. They say the national department would not do this. Well, the city and State departments are supposed not to do it, but they do it with an iron hand. The citizens do not want political doctors bossing therapeutics.

I call attention also to a word said by Herbert Spencer on this subject that is interesting and instructive:

Moved as are the projectors of a railway, who, whilst secretly hoping for salaries, persuade themselves and others that the proposed railway will be beneficial to the public—moved, as all men are under such circumstances, by nine parts of self-interest gilt over with one part of philanthropy—surgeons and physicians are vigorously striving to erect a medical establishment akin to our religious one. Little do the public at large know how actively professional publications are agitating for State appointive overseers of the public health. There is an unmistakable wish to establish and organize a tax-supported class charged with the health of men's bodies as the clergy are charged with the health of their souls. And whoever has watched how institutions grow, how little by little a very innocent-looking infancy unfolds into a formidable maturity, with vested interests, political influence, and a strong instinct of self-preservation, will see that the germs here peeping forth are quite capable under favorable circumstances of developing into such an organization.

These are only samples of numerous declarations on this subject. Others might be cited, but time will not permit. The ones given are amply sufficient to show what is ahead of us in the strenuous and remarkable effort of an interested class to procure legislation that will immeasurably increase their power at the expense of the liberty of the whole people.

Mr. President, it is not only what they want that should lead us to consider their demands with the greatest caution. The means by which they propose to procure what they want is more reprehensible, and should condemn their whole effort as unreasonable, unjust, and tyrannical. They propose to enter into politics in its worst and most disgraceful form to force from Congress and State legislatures the laws they want. This is clearly shown by their own declarations and official acts. They show something more than this. It appears from the declarations to which I am about to call attention that their claim that they are working unselfishly and in the interest of humanity is a mere pretense. They are working in the interest of themselves and no one else. Let me call the attention of the Senate to a few of the many expressions of this kind, showing conclusively the selfish motive behind this movement. The South Carolina Medical Journal states:

We all know (or ought to know if we are old enough to practice medicine) that legislation is not accomplished in the effulgent sunlight of a noisy public, not on the hustings of a demagogic campaign meeting, nor even (where one might suppose) on the oratorical forum of the House of Representatives.

It is conceived, laid, and hatched in political byways and hedges; around the corner on the dead quiet, with soft words and apt reasoning.

The president of the North Dakota State Medical Association, addressing the association, says:

We are better equipped to pass sane and important legislation than any other body of men and to make ourselves felt in public matters, owing to our intimate relations, as family physicians and advisers, with the voters throughout the State.

Dr. Cornelius Williams, president of the Minnesota State Medical Association, in his presidential address at the forty-first annual meeting, October, 1909, as reported in the Journal of the American Medical Association November 20, 1909, said:

I declare that it is only by a participation in politics that the physician may accomplish his whole mission, and that such participation is one of his highest duties. From the very nature of his position his duties place him in the rôle of police; he must suppress or regulate whatever is injurious to the peace, health, morality, general intelligence, and thrift of the community and its internal safety. Isolated in the sense that there is no concert of action, the medical man is a negligible quantity, as to any influence, either for good or bad legislation; but united into a guild of workers, the medical body would be a great power to determine the outcome of an election and to direct the measures of government.

Dr. Charles J. Whalen in the Illinois Medical Journal last September stated, among other things:

Medicine as a means of livelihood has arrived at the most critical period of its history. The economic status and outlook for the profession is pitiable. A feeling exists among a large number of the profession that medicine should be represented more numerously than it is in the legislatures.

"We should have at least as many physicians as lawyers in Congress," says a recent correspondent in the Lancet-Clinic.

In its report two years ago the public-relations committee of the Chicago Medical Society said:

The medical profession will never get what it is entitled to in the way of legislation until it wakes up and becomes a factor to be reckoned with politically. This can best be done by bringing the lawmakers to a realization of the tremendous influence of organized medicine and the votes they will lose if they do not give the profession respectful consideration.

As an organization we should not only ask for what we want but should be in a position to demand it if necessary.

In medicine, as in other forms of business, unification for mutual protection must be brought about. In organization lies our only hope.

From the Lancet-Clinic, of Cincinnati, for February 18, 1911, under the title "Organization gone mad," I take this:

The American Medical Association is perhaps the best illustration of the effect of the organization furore. It has become to all intents and purposes a huge oligarchy. Its policies are directed by a few, who, ostensibly acting as the agents of the members, in reality take the initiative in every movement, assisted thereto by the constitution of the society itself. The spirit of democracy is as foreign to it as it is in the realm of the Czar of all the Russias. It is the natural result of the modern trend of concentration, subordinating private judgment to the leaders' dictum.

We see the same result in the various State organizations. As in the national association, so in the State societies, the thoughts of the members are cribbed, cabined, and confined. If anyone so far forgets himself as to dissent from the established order, he is made to feel the sting of disapproval, until he is glad to hide himself and his views from the gaze of his associates.

The machine is well oiled and the steam roller runs smoothly. Members are extremely careful to avoid being run over. Hence, whatever is, is right.

At a meeting of the State Medical Association of Wisconsin held in June, 1911, and reported in the Wisconsin Medical Journal for the same month, Dr. A. R. Craig, assistant to the secretary of the American Medical Association, described the evolution of that body as follows:

The whole subject of the work of the organization has been to me a wonderfully interesting thing. In studying this subject I have been interested to find how few men really had a suspicion of what the possibilities of a real organization were. If you read the history of the American Medical Association, you will find that in the old days a delightful lot of gentlemen would meet together and promulgate and expound and resolve and adjourn; and in another year they would come together once more in a new field and again orate and expound and resolve and adjourn. So the American Medical Association went on for some 40 or 50 years of its growth. True, it was gathering new forms and new impetus and was doing something, but you could practically see nothing of the work that was accomplished except a pleasant time was had at each annual session. Then came that wonderful epoch in the association's life when things began to happen after a year or two, and the American Medical Association met once a year, but lived through the year. To-day, if you were to go to Chicago you would find on the corner of Dearborn and Indiana Avenue a 7-story structure with some 150 employees, your employees, working every day in the year to accomplish your ends under your delegated direction, to accomplish the purposes and ends of that organization. I would like to say that this organization will be completed and will be really effective when each State in its turn is organized in such a way that you do not meet for a week's session or a three or four days' session, but you meet as a board of bank directors might meet, to determine the policy of the machine which is to be effective throughout the year.

These various quotations show that it is not the public that is demanding this legislation, but a political machine, an oligarchy of a few doctors in control of the American Medical Association, and who have so far become intoxicated with their success as to forget discretion. As an illustration, let me quote to you the statement of Dr. Charles A. L. Reed in a speech delivered at Chicago and widely quoted in medical journals:

When a committee of the American Medical Association went to the Fifty-eighth Congress, their legislative committee said, "Can't you boil down what you have to say into 20 minutes?" There were in that Congress one doctor in the Senate and none in the House.

In the Fifty-ninth Congress there were three doctors in the House and one in the Senate. The doctors all over the country had been using their influence, so the committee said, "Just tell us what you want, gentlemen; take as much time as you like."

In the Sixtieth Congress there were five doctors, all told, and because of the same influence we simply went to the Willard Hotel and sent for Congressmen to come to us, and they came. * * * In the next Congress I have every reason to believe there will be 25 physicians.

WHY SHOULD CONGRESS INTRUST THEM WITH THIS GREAT POWER?

Mr. President, there is no complaint now of the inefficiency or lack of power or authority on the part of the various health bureaus now in existence and supported by the National Government. The Public Health and National Quarantine Bureau is given ample and sufficient power to deal with all such questions. No new legislation on the subject is necessary. Even the bringing together of these various bureaus whose province it is to deal with public-health questions, attached as they are to different departments of the Government and performing different and varied functions affecting the departments to which they respectively belong, not only will not strengthen them but will result in confusion, conflicts of authority, and weakness.

But, Mr. President, I desire to go a little deeper than this into the wisdom and propriety of vesting in one school of medicine such unlimited power over the health, even the lives of the people of the country. What claims to superior knowledge and understanding have the old school or "regulars" in medicine that should induce Congress to give over to them this vast power over the public health?

I have no animosities against the doctors, individually or as a class. They have their work to do in the interest of mankind, and should be fully protected in their right to pursue that work. It is needed in the interest of mankind, because the great majority of the people still believe in the medical doctor and his drugs. So long as this is the case the physician of whatever school should be fully and amply protected in his right to administer what his patients believe in and want. This must be so in a free country like ours so long as there is a single individual who believes in and wants the services of a medical doctor. That is what I call medical freedom. On the other hand, they who do not believe in the efficacy of drugs or in the services of a medical practitioner, but who do believe in another and different remedy, should be accorded the same right, and that right should be jealously protected. That, too, is medical freedom. No one class of men who believe in one mode of healing as against all others have a right to force that method upon others who do not believe in it. That is tyranny and a violation of the liberties of the people.

Mr. President, I have no objection even to the American Medical Association, so long as it confines its efforts to the advancement of science as it sees it or for the elevation of the standard of the physicians of its school of medicine, or the advancement in any way of members of its own profession. I do not complain even of its attempt to benefit its own members by legislation. But I do object most seriously to the intolerant, tyrannical, and oppressive efforts it has been making for years to prevent other schools of medicine or the practitioners of other modes of healing from exercising their right to heal the sick. Its course in this respect has been un-American. It is an offense to free government. Its pretensions of superior knowledge on these great and vital subjects are unwarranted. I have already shown by the declaration of one of their own members that the "basis of the entire profession of medicine is faith in the doctor and his drugs and his methods."

If this be so, and it is abundantly supported by experience and competent authority, it would seem that the one important thing, the just thing for them to do, is to prove themselves and their modes of healing worthy of this faith. This must be done by their works. It can not be done by assailing and persecuting those who have lost faith in them and their drugs and transferred it to others.

Everyone who thinks knows that the practice of medicine is not a science. Remedies are adopted to-day and abandoned as worthless to-morrow. The medical practitioner of 50 years ago is looked upon by members of his own profession of to-day as an ignoramus, and the remedies he used then are regarded as wholly worthless and even as destroyers of health. Fifty years from now, I predict, the men of to-day who administer drugs as a means of healing will be looked back upon as enemies to health.

But, Mr. President, I am not going to leave this position of mine as to the unreliability of medical treatment of sickness and disease to rest upon my own opinion of it, although I speak from abundant and painful experience. I am going to call as witnesses of the truth of what I say men of superior knowledge and experience. The first is the late Prof. William James, world-famed professor of psychology of Harvard University. In an address delivered at the second hearing before the committee on public health of the Legislature of Massachusetts, at Boston, March 2, 1898, opposing proposed legislation which would exclude all but medical practitioners from exercising their right to heal the sick, the professor had this to say:

Mr. Chairman, I rise to protest this bill. I come to represent no body of persons with special interests, but simply as a private citizen interested in good laws and in the growth of medical knowledge. The medical profession are urging the bill in the interests, as they believe, of true science. Those who oppose it, they think, can do so only in the interests of ignorance and quackery. I hold a medical degree from Harvard University. I belonged for many years to the most scientific of our medical societies. I have taught anatomy and physiology, and now teach mental pathology in Harvard College. The presumption is that I am also interested in science. I am, indeed; and it is, in fact, because I see in this bill—along with some good intentions—a movement in favor of ignorance that I am here to oppose it.

It will inevitably trammel the growth of medical experience and knowledge. Were medicine at present a finished science, with all practitioners in agreement about methods of treatment, such a bill as this, to make it penal to treat a patient without having passed an examination, would be unobjectionable. But it would also be unnecessary then. No one would attempt to cure people without the instruction required.

But the present condition of medical knowledge is widely different from such a state. Both as to principle and as to practice our knowledge is deplorably imperfect. The whole face of medicine changes unexpectedly from one generation to another in consequence of widening experience; and, as we look back with a mixture of amusement and horror at the practice of our grandfathers, so we can not be sure how large a portion of our present practice will awaken similar feelings in our posterity.

Each generation adds something, it is to be hoped, to the treament that will not pass away. Few of us recall the introduction of the water cure, but many now living can recall the discovery of anesthetics. Most of us recollect when medical electricity and massage came in, and we have all witnessed the spreading triumphs of antiseptic surgery, and are now hearing of the antitoxins and of the way in which hypnotic suggestion and all the other purely mental therapeutic methods are achieving cures.

Some of these therapeutic methods arose inside of the regular profession; others outside of it. In all cases they have appealed to experience for their credentials. But experience in medicine seems to be an exceedingly difficult thing. Take homeopathy, for instance, now nearly a century old. An enormous mass of experience, both of homeopathic doctors and their patients, is invoked in favor of the efficiency of these remedies and doses. But the regular profession stands firm in its belief that such experience is worthless and that the whole history is one of quackery and delusion. In spite of the rival schools appealing to experience, their conflict is much more like that of two philosophers or two theologists. Your experience, says one side to the other, simply isn't fit to count.

So we have great schools of medical practice, each with its well-satisfied adherents, living on in absolute ignorance of each other and of each other's experience. How many of the graduates, recent or early, of the Harvard Medical School have spent 24 hours of their lives in experimentally testing homeopathic remedies or seeing them tested? Probably not 10 in the whole Commonwealth. How many of my learned medical friends, who to-day are so freely denouncing mind-cure methods as an abominable superstition, have taken the pains to follow up the cases of some mind curer, one by one, so as to acquaint themselves with the results? I doubt if there be a single individual. Of such experience as that they say: "Give me ignorance rather than knowledge." And the club opinion of the Massachusetts Medical Society pats them on the head and backs them up. I don't blame any set of practitioners for remaining ignorant of all practice but their own. The subject is too overwhelmingly great. It takes an entire life to gain adequate experience of a few diseases and a few remedial methods. When a doctor notes what he considers good effects from his own practice, it is natural for him to let well enough alone and refrain from exploring unknown lines. Here, as elsewhere, individual success goes the better for a certain narrowness, which therefore is not wholly evil. But when ignorance and narrowness, instead of being humble, grow insolent and authoritative and ask for laws whose only immediate result can be to consecrate and perpetuate them, then I think that every citizen interested in the growth of a genuine complete medical science should rise up and protest.

I am here as such a citizen, having no axes to grind except the ax of truth; that "truth" for which Harvard University professes to exist. I count some of the medical advocates of this proposed law among my dearest friends, and well do I know how I shall stand in their eyes hereafter for standing to-day in my present position. But my duty is to the larger society, the Commonwealth. I can not look passively, and I must urge my point.

That point is this, that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is not a medical body, has no right to a medical opinion, and should not dare to take sides in medical controversies. This safe neutral position the friends of the proposed legislation summon the Commonwealth immediately to give up. One would suppose that any act of sane persons interested in the growth of medical truth would rejoice if other persons were found willing to push out of their experiences in the mental-healing direction and provide a mass of material out of which the conditions and limits of such therapeutic methods at last become clear. One would suppose that our orthodox medical brethren might so rejoice, but instead of rejoicing they adopt the fiercely partisan attitude of a powerful trades union, demanding legislation against the competition of the "scabs." They summon the State to disregard absolutely all the peculiar conditions under which the mental-healing operations flourish to-day, and say to the mind curers, "Pass our State examinations or go to our State's prison." Abstractly it sounds magnificent to say that our State protects its citizens against the ignorance of practitioners. In the living concreteness of the matter, however, not only is such a claim an utter farce, but in this particular business of mental healing there can be no doubt that if the proposed law were really enforced it would stamp out and arrest the acquisition of one large branch of medical experience. What the real interests of medicine require is that mental therapeutics should not be stamped out, but studied, and its law ascertained. For that the mind curers must at least be suffered to make their experiments. If they can not interpret their results aright, why then let the orthodox M. D.'s follow up their facts and study and interpret them. But to force the mind curers to a State examination is to kill the experiments outright.

The mind curers and their public return the scorn of the regular profession with an equal scorn and will never come up for the examination. Their movement is a religious or quasi religious movement; personality is one condition of success there, and impressions and intuitions seem to accomplish more than chemical, anatomical, or physiological information.

These are the facts, gentlemen. You, as legislators, are not bound either to affirm or deny them yourselves, either to deplore them or rejoice at them, or in any way to judge them from a medical point of view, but simply, after ascertaining that thousands of intelligent citizens believe in them, decide whether to legislate or not. Do you feel called on, do you dare, to thrust the coarse machinery of criminal law into these vital mysteries, into these personal relations of doctor and patient, into these infinitely subtle operations of nature, and enact that a whole department of medical investigation (for such it is), together with the special conditions of freedom under which it flourishes, must cease to be?

I venture to say that you dare not, gentlemen, you dare not convert the laws of this Commonwealth into obstacles to the acquisition of truth. You dare not do it, gentlemen—and yet that is what you are asked to do exactly if you pass this bill.

Pray do not fail, Mr. Chairman, to catch my point. You are not to ask yourself whether these mind curers do really achieve the successes that are claimed. It is enough for you, as legislators, to ascertain that a large number of our citizens, persons as intelligent and well educated as yourself or I, persons whose number seems daily to increase, are convinced that they do achieve them, are persuaded that a valuable new department of medical experience is by them opening up. Here is a purely medical question, regarding which our general court, not being a wellspring and source of medical virtue, not having any private test of therapeutic truth, must remain strictly neutral under penalty of making the confusion worse.

In the matter of pharmacy, in the matter of such an art as plumbing, the legislature may impose examination and grant license without harm. The facts are here ultra simple in comparison, and no differences whatever of conscientious opinion among the experts as to what is right. But this case of medical practice is absolutely different. It is the confusion, the deplorable imperfection of the most expert knowledge, and the conscientious divergencies of opinion, the infinite complication of the phenomena, and the varying and mutually exclusive fields of experience that are the very essence of the case.

I know well what those friends of mine of the Massachusetts Medical Society, who would presume to act as your advisers, will think. Having worked as hard and as conscientiously as they have worked to acquire the wisdom they possess, they will think it little less than treason in a person academically brought up to depreciate publicly as I do the results of all those labors. They certainly thought it a gross insult when I compared their noble desire to purge the State of quackery to the greediness of a trades union asking for legislative protection against scabs. Well, I hate to appear in my brothers' eyes as a traitor to a cause which for them is identical with that of science and education, and for which they will burn with so holy a zeal, for my cause is that of science and education, too. Heaven forbid that I should make light of the glorious achievements of modern surgery. Taking one sort of education with another, a medical education is, on the whole, as broadening and deepening an education as I know.

And if some fatality were laid on us whereby one type of practitioners must perforce be singled out for license and all other types stamped out, I should unhesitatingly vote to license the Harvard Medical School type, for it lies in the spirit of science to correct its own mistakes in the end, and I should hope that little by little, though with infinite slowness, many of the things well known outside of the medical schools, but not known there at present, might possibly be rediscovered by one adventurous spirit or another inside, and finally accrete with the final body of doctrine. Even the mind-cure methods might eventually be resurrected in this way. But, thank heaven, no such fatal necessity of giving exclusive license to one type of mind now weighs upon this legislature. Our State needs the assistance of every type of mind, academic and nonacademic, of which she possesses specimens. There are none too many of them, for to no one of them can the whole truth be revealed. Each is necessarily partly perceptive and partly blind. Even the very best type is partly blind. There are methods which it can not bring itself to use.

The blindness of a type of mind is not diminished when those who have it band themselves together in a corporate profession. By just as much as they hold each other to be thorough and conscientious there, by just so much along the other lines do they not only permit but even compel each other to be shallow. When I was a medical student I feel sure that any one of us would have been ashamed to be caught looking into a homeopathic book by a professor. We had to sneer at homeopathy by word of command. Such was the school opinion at that time, and I imagine the similar encouragements to superficiality in various directions exist in the medical schools of to-day.

Now, as to calling the Massachusetts Medical Society a trades union trying to influence legislation against scabs, I can hardly imagine any member of the society affirming that in the movement for the present bill trades-union motives are totally absent. Take a struggling practitioner, young or old, in a small place. He has spent years of life and thousands of dollars in fitting himself for his work. Conscientious and self-sacrificing to the last degree, he deserves some acknowledgment and reward. What can his feelings be when he sees the faith curer alongside and the metaphysical healer opposite, with no education, with no sacrifices, with nothing but what to him seems their silly optimism and preposterous conceit, stealing patients from him by the dozen? He can feel nothing but righteous indignation; and when he tells the tale to his colleagues, their blood boils like his. The State owes some protection to us who have done right, they say. And the medical politicians who run the society's affairs, however great their disinterested zeal for the public health may be—and I am the last to deny that—assuredly are not altogether forgetful of this other aspect of the case. The trades-union instinct has to be strong in every professional society. There are always some members who, if they had power, would put down heresy like Spanish inquisitors, and there are times when such members may come to the top.

Pray, remember all these facts, gentlemen of the committee, in listening to your advisers on the opposite side. Whatever you do, you are bound not to obstruct the growth of truth by the freest gathering in of the most various experiences. I urge that the best way to do that is to say "hands off," and let the present law, which is abstractly a good one, and only four years old, alone.

The hinge of my whole contention, you see, is that in strictly medical quarrels the State has no right to interfere. I know there are other aspects of this bill with which every decent man must sympathize. The flood of quackery and medical ignorance about us is sickening to think of. One's first impulse is to get up and scream, saying: "Why is there not a law to stop it?" One's heart bleeds, one's fingers itch at the persistent impunity. But so it is with the vileness of our newspapers, with their medical advertisements and other filth, so it is with the rottenness of much of our public life. Yet laws can not reach such symptoms. Heine said: "Every nation has the Jews it deserves." Certainly every nation has the newspapers and the politicians it deserves. And it has the medical practice it deserves. A people that loves quacks will have them, laws or no laws. Instead of crying for legal protection, the medical profession ought to educate the people better. They must remember that the aversion which they find in the public and from which they suffer, has historic roots. The history of medicine is a really hideous history, comparable only with that of priestcraft—ignorance clad in authority and riding over men's bodies and souls. Let modern medicine dispel all those inherited prejudices by living the historic memories down. It may well be questioned whether a régime of license and monopoly will tend to hasten that even as much as one of freedom and conciliation.

Above all things, Mr. Chairman, let us not be infected with the Gaelic spirit of regulation and reglementation for their own abstract sakes. Let us not grow hysterical about lawmaking. Let us not fall in love with enactments and penalties because they are so logical and sound so pretty and look so nice on paper. Let us cultivate a robust Anglo-Saxon spirit of insensibility and tolerance, toughening ourselves manfully to the sight of much that we abhor, and of still more that we can but imperfectly understand. The death rate is not rising, in spite of all quackery. That shows that we are not in any crisis of danger, and surely justifies you in letting well enough alone.

Mr. President, the broad-minded view thus taken of this question by one who has been educated in a medical school, and whose sympathies were clearly with that school of healing, makes one think better of his country. It is a bright light shining out of the darkness of intolerance and bigotry.

The bill was defeated in Massachusetts, much to the credit of the State. The effort to secure its passage was attempted again this year, as it has been every year for several years past, but the effort signally failed. It is said, whether truthfully or not I do not know, that Prof. James was reprimanded by the then president of Harvard University for his utterances on this occasion and cautioned against repeating them, the reason given being that it was a direct reflection on the Harvard Medical School.

The estimation in which medical healing is held is indicated by the following editorial from the San Francisco Call:

Medical, hygienic, and therapeutic freedom will supply the subjects for consideration at the conference of the northern California branch of the League of Medical Freedom, which meets in this city on Thursday. The league represents a movement that stands for liberty and freedom from the dictation of this or that school of medicine. It is constitutionally and radically opposed to setting up an official orthodoxy in the practice of medicine. It is opposed to the movement that would place in the hands of one school an artificially created authority to enforce its doctrines, practices, and beliefs on an unwilling public.

If medicine were an exact science there might be some apology for the legal enforcement of orthodox practices, but this is notoriously not the case. "Doctors differ" as much and as widely to-day as they did a hundred years ago. For example, the believers in Christian Science are legion and, although they are not medically orthodox, we know, everybody knows, that they have accomplished valuable and even marvelous results. The movement formulated in the Owen bill, now pending before Congress, for the creation of a national health department, is intended primarily to set up a medical orthodoxy invested with power, if not to prohibit, at least to hamper, practitioners and patients who do not hold the tenets of a regular school.

There are a dozen differing schools of medicine, and one of these seeks a monopoly created by law and invested with authority to make things unpleasant for all whom they regard as medical heretics.

Mr. President, it is not only that the practice of medicine is not a science and is uncertain and unreliable, but the political and tyrannical methods used by the doctors in attempting to force through objectionable and oppressive laws are subversive of liberty. The following, from the Columbus Medical Journal, shows how the people regard such methods:

MEDICAL GRAFT OPPOSED.

The doctors have a bill before the legislature in the State of California which, if passed, will give them complete control of the public schools and reduce our school children to a medical tyranny that could not be duplicated anywhere on earth. The following is an account of it, taken from one of the California papers:

"A bill in the legislature, drawn by Prof. Leslie, a public-school teacher of Los Angeles, is being fought by the National League for Medical Freedom. It is urged by the allopathic, or regular, doctors.

"The bill provides for the establishment in the public schools of California of 'health and development supervision.' Practically this means, as elaborated in the bill, the hiring by the State of hundreds of doctors, dentists, nurses, experts in all the various branches of mental and physical upbuilding, at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars a year. These doctors would examine and treat pupils free.

"Besides the work of these medical men in the schools, Prof. Leslie adds: 'An effective follow-up service, which shall bring about effective cooperation between parents, teachers, and school authorities in meeting the demands of health, growth, and efficiency of pupils, students, and teachers; said follow-up service shall be conducted by examining staffs, assisted by trained nurses and social-service workers.'

"The bill puts all this under the direction of a State director of health and development at $4,000 a year. Assisting him would be an immense staff of physicians and all the adjuncts of hospitals, laboratories, gymnasiums, etc.

"With county medical directors, as planned, there might be 58 of those doctors alone. The possibilities for graft under the bill are tremendous. The University of California is designed to furnish the main supply of experts for the work. As its medical schools are both allopathic, it is readily seen that the bill plays into the hands of the Medical Trust, now firmly rooted in California, and would furnish it a new and magnificent field of operation and profit.

"It goes without saying that no regular physician would appoint or work with others of differing schools. The bitterness of the opposing factions in the curative sciences is intense. Leslie, the author of the bill, who has been here for weeks pushing it, is a humanitarian, apparently without guile, but his measure is believed by legislators who have examined it perfectly fitted to make a powerful politico-medical machine which would run schools, pupils, and parents for the benefit of the allopaths.

"The allopaths maintain a lobby here right along. Besides, through their influence as family physicians to a majority of the more prosperous citizens of the State, they have decided influence with the heads of these families throughout California. All this influence is being used, except by those allopathic doctors who see the evil of the bill.

"The National League for Medical Freedom is against the measure. This league is composed of members of all the other schools of medicine, surgery, etc., other than the allopathic. The homeopaths, osteopaths, naturopaths, eclectics, Christian Scientists, and others think the

"The objections of the league are stated briefly:

"There is no necessity for such a bill. It is un-American, tyrannical, and abridges individual liberty.

"It opens up possibilities of looting the State treasury and increasing taxation through the employment of an army of physicians and experts and the establishment of numerous special schools.

"It opens a way for one school of medicine to obtain a medical monopoly and give them a strangle hold on the public schools which could not be shaken off in years.

"The league says that the enactment of the bill into law would be the beginning of medical slavery and State medicine. A fine and imprisonment is to punish State employees who fail to carry out the provisions of the bill."

"The bill was introduced into the assembly by Assemblyman Cattell, of Los Angeles. The allopathic physicians of California, through the State Medical Association and its agents here, are determined to get it through."

Fortunately for the good name of California, this iniquitous bill was defeated.

Following is another account of how they do it in Illinois:

[Copy of a letter circulated in Illinois.]

CHICAGO MEDICAL SOCIETY (ORGANIZED 1852), SECRETARY'S AND TREASURER'S OFFICES,
September 6, 1910.

DR. E. LANDUS, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR DOCTOR: In the primaries of the respective political parties to be held September 15, the following candidates are deserving of consideration at the hands of the medical profession residing in the twenty-fifth senatorial district: Messrs. Crocker, Waage, Freund, and Olson, each having agreed, if elected, to support the medical profession and the public in the forty-seventh general assembly in their effort to prevent the passage of any vicious medical legislation.

At the last session of the legislature your Representative Breidt voted "Yes" for senate bill 214 (osteopathic), but did not vote on senate bill 351, which was in substance the same as No. 214. As no organized effort was made to prevent the enactment of No. 214 until after its passage in the senate, and the fact that senators voting for the bill in many cases did so under the impression that the bill met with approval of the medical profession, we therefore feel that no effort should be made to punish anybody for voting yes on 214, but with 351 the situation is different. They should be held strictly accountable for voting yes on No. 351.

Mr. Hulzee voted "No" on 214; was absent or not voting on 351. Deserving of your condemnation politically is Charles L. Fieldstack, who voted "Yes" on No. 214, and, in spite of the missionary work that was done and the pressure brought to bear from his physician constituents, he repeated the dosage by voting "Yes" on 351, and he should be held strictly accountable for so voting, as both were vicious measures granting special privileges to certain cults who desired to enter the practice by a short and easy route—medicine. It is incumbent upon the physicians in the twenty-fifth senatorial district to see that Mr. Fieldstack is eliminated politically on September 15.

Every family in the twenty-fifth senatorial district is attended by some member of our profession. Our power is great if we make a concerted move. It is up to you to do your part. Will you do it? Let us hear from you.

Fraternally, yours,

ALEXANDER H. FERGUSON, M. D., Chicago,
President.
ALFRED C. COTTON, M. D., Chicago,
President.
GEO. F. SUKER, M. D., Chicago,

EDMUND W. WEIS, M. D., Ottawa,

J. V. FOWLER, M. D., Chicago.

N. B.—Most voters have no special choice and few will refuse their family doctor. Get busy. There is another point you want to remember: If you happen to be of opposite political faith, it is no reason that you have not 50 or 100 friends that you can see who are of the same political faith as the candidate. Don't forget the "personal favor." We ask you to see 50 or 100 friends that are voters. Do you realize what this means? Eleven thousand physicians in Illinois seeing the number indicated would amount to the following: Eleven thousand times 50 equals 550,000 voters. This means victory, something that each individual physician should feel proud of. Talk it over with your brother practitioners and clients.

I submit another newspaper item from Medical Freedom, taken from the New Orleans Times-News. It shows such pernicious activity and indecent haste to secure the appointment of a public official who would be friendly to the legislation the doctors were seeking as to excite just indignation, and the extent to which they propose to go in the effort to procure favorable action by Congress:

TO SUCCEED WYMAN—AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION SAYS SELECTION OF DR. WHYTE, OF NEW ORLEANS, WILL INSURE DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH—DR. M'CORMACK, POLITICAL MASTER OF THE A. M. A., STARTED HIS MACHINE WORKING BEFORE GEN. WYMAN'S FUNERAL DATE HAD BEEN SET.

It has been no secret that the A. M. A. opposed the late Walter Wyman, Surgeon General of the United States. Its members made many demands for his retirement because he did not use his office to lobby for their pet measure—the National Department of Health. The following item from the New Orleans Times-News bureau naively tells a story of political selfishness, haste, and bad taste that would be almost incredible if it emanated from elsewhere than the "political doctors."

The item reads: "A boom has been launched, having for its object the landing of Dr. J. H. Whyte, head of the United States Marine-Hospital Service at New Orleans, for the vacancy as Surgeon General, caused by the recent death of Dr. Walter Wyman. The effort comes from Bowling Green, Ky., and the Louisiana State Board of Health was apprised of it in a letter received from Dr. Joseph McCormack, of that place, and a member of the council of health and public instruction of the American Medical Association, which booms Dr. Whyte for the place enthusiastically.

"The following is the text of the letter sent Dr. Oscar Dowling, president of the State board of health, New Orleans, La.:

"'DEAR DOCTOR: Am just in receipt of a telegram announcing the death of Gen. Wyman. Am writing to know if you will at once bring every influence to bear on President Taft, through your Senators, Representatives, and others, to have Dr. Joseph H. Whyte, of New Orleans, appointed as Surgeon General. He is one of the strongest men in the service, has always been an active advocate of the National Department of Health, and his appointment almost assures its creation.

"'Trusting in your full cooperation, and asking to hear from you, I am,

"'Cordially, yours, J. H. MCCORMACK, M. D.'"

I have no doubt that Dr. Whyte is a very worthy man and would have made a good Surgeon General, but it is fortunate that he was not appointed with such influences behind him. It is quite likely that his support defeated him, for the President knew of this letter before the appointment was made, and the President is a just man possessed of a high sense of decency and the proprieties.

COLLECTION AND DISSEMINATION OF INFORMATION.

The bill provides:

That it shall be the duty of the bureau of health to collect and disseminate information relating to the public health.

This is one of the most deadly provisions in the bill. This Government is now spending hundreds of thousands of dollars to send broadcast the details of sickness, disease, and suffering.

It is by this means planting the seeds of disease and killing more innocent and unsuspecting people than drugs ever saved. The people are being taught to think of sickness, disease, and death when they should be thinking of health and life. Doctors are traveling all over the country describing the symptoms and causes of tuberculosis and other life-destroying diseases, not only to grown men and women, but to school children. They describe the so-called disease germs or microbes and their effects on the body, and picture, by word of mouth and by charts, illustrated lectures, and moving pictures, the ravages of the disease. These horrifying and gruesome pictures and senseless and inhuman details of the causes and ravages of disease excite the very fear that breeds and fosters disease. These lectures are given in the schools and innocent children are made their victims. Instead of being encouraged it should be made a crime.

I have a letter written by a lady to the League for Medical Freedom calling attention to one case of this kind. Fortunately the chief offender in this case was not a doctor. He was the representative of the Antituberculosis Society. But the incomprehensible thing about it is that the teachers and officers of the public schools in an enlightened community should allow such an outrage to be committed. The letter is as follows:

Inclosed please find a few clippings that may be of interest to you. Mr. Dee Brown—he is not a doctor of medicine, but of philosophy—is being paid by the Anti-Tuberculosis Society to come here and enter on a campaign of a month to address all the schools in the city and educate them along the lines of symptoms and their results of this disease. They started in on Friday, and it happened that they went to the grade schools on the west side—that is, those that are in the section we call the Union School—by noon they reached the Union High and assembled the high-school children in one of the rooms. He went into the minutest detail of the symptoms of this disease, and told them that they might have the disease and not know it; that many times the tissues of the lungs were so badly gone before the patient knew that he had the disease that there was no help for him. He said sometimes you may have a tired feeling in the morning; this is one of the marked symptoms. You may have a flush on your cheeks, and not know this is one of the worst symptoms, and he went on down the line. He filled the children so full of fear that one beautiful tall girl fell in a dead faint on the hard floor, striking on her temple, and they were obliged to call a carriage and send her home, and when one of the teachers called at the home Saturday afternoon she had not regained consciousness enough to realize what had happened to her. She is still under a doctor's care, with a very bad black eye and face. Two other girls were helped out of the room and one or two others braced up by the teachers, and the boys fairly turned pale.

Everybody supposed, of course, he was a physician, and they could not understand his unprofessional way of presenting his subject to these children. They teach these children to have implicit confidence in what they teach them, and, of course, their thought is receptive. After the talk the children stood around in groups and expressed themselves as being very much disturbed because they were obliged to listen to such stuff, and a number of them went to the teachers afterwards and asked why they were obliged to listen to it.

Monday morning he went to the Central High, and his talk was the first hour. They locked the session doors and compelled all the children to enter the general assembly hall.

Saturday, Sunday, and Monday we got busy on this work, and did all we could to have the lecture toned down and the worst part eliminated, but now we are setting about to have the entire lecture course eliminated. We have appealed to the parents of our city, as many as we can reach over the phone, and asked them to send in protests to the board of education. Last evening was the regular monthly meeting of the board, and a few went up to the meeting and personally protested, which resulted in a committee of three being appointed to investigate the matter and hear some of his lectures. I do not think he will dare to give again the talk that he gave to the Union High children.

This man has just finished a campaign in Wisconsin, covering the State completely, and he has now entered Michigan to do the same thing. I am going into detail, thinking it may be of some help to you with the work in the State, and if Detroit has planned for a similar campaign you will be better prepared to head it off.

We had a talk with the girl's attending physician and he said it was outrageous. Such talk should never be allowed in even one instance, etc. He gave us the privilege of using his name, but, as he has stated, he is not an agitator and he is not one to stir things up much.

I hope you will advertise this, for it needs all the publicity we can give it. Mr. Weston is writing an article for us this week and we are going to send out 500 of them to the parents of school children. We have a meeting of the executive committee of the league this afternoon and we will plan something in the way of a protest. We are doing all we can to have it eliminated from the schools, and if they want to give such talks to give them to the adults.

With best wishes to all,

Sincerely, FRANCES W. SPEARMAN.

Mr. President, see how this idea grows. Here is another enlightened guardian of the public health proposing to educate children in the knowledge of disease by introducing moving pictures of the ravages of tuberculosis and disease germs. He got the idea from a young girl who had learned to "describe the formation and construction of tuberculosis bacillus to a surprising degree," he says. And she got this gruesome information from illustrated lectures in Carnegie Hall, in New York. Here is the account given of it by the Memphis Press:

As to the paths to be pursued before this term end by public-school children in search of facts pertaining to health welfare, it is probable that "a child shall lead them." For it was a child's knowledge of things beyond the ken of physiology textbooks in the public school which set Dr. M. Goltman, city healther, to thinking out a plan for furthering the knowledge of school children in the matter of health.

As a result lectures on health subjects, illustrated by moving pictures, will sooner or later become a feature of public-school instruction. This will follow the advent of more school inspectors, which Dr. Goltman is now striving to have added to the meager force.

"I got my idea from conversation with my 13-year-old niece in the East," said Dr. Goltman. "She was able to describe the formation and construction of tuberculosis bacillus to a surprising degree, and she knew other things a growing child should know, and knew them in the right way. I was astounded, and asked if she learned those things in school. She said no; that she attended illustrated lectures at Carnegie Hall and like places, because she was interested. These places are open to those who care to attend in New York, but I thought to myself, 'Why not build up a course of study and instruction in the public schools along those lines?' And if I have my say, Memphis will have the first regular course in its public schools of health and hygiene with the aid of moving pictures, thus going New York one better in its estimable work."

One would think this fearful raid on the health and lives of the children might stop there. But the doctors seem to be vieing with each other in efforts to disease the minds of innocent children and ignorant adults. At the sixty-fifth annual meeting of the Ohio State Medical Association Dr. C. C. Probst, of Columbus, in an address on "The protection of child life," said:

More progress would be made if no further effort were made to "teach old dogs new tricks," but attention should be devoted to the training of the school children in hygiene and sanitation and physical education. This would mean a new man in school life—a school physician. It would mean school supervision, not school inspection.

And at the sixty-first annual meeting of the American Medical Association, at St. Louis, June, 1910, the use of the theater as a means of conveying information about disease and disease germs was recommended. Dr. Masyck P. Ravenal, of Madison, Wis., had this to say on the subject:

In regard to the use of the theater for instructing the public along the lines of preventive medicine, may I tell you what we have done in Wisconsin? Many of you have probably seen notices in the newspapers of the play "In Germland." This was given by the young ladies taking work in the department of bacteriology and hygiene at the University of Wisconsin. The characters were all dressed in costumes representing as nearly as possible various germs as we see them in stained preparations, both the useful and the harmful germs being represented. No charge was made for admission, cards of invitation being issued. It was given as a department matter for our own entertainment and instruction, yet the demand for admission from outside taxed the resources of our hall to the utmost, and throughout the country the greatest interest was excited.

Our stage scenery was made as instructive as possible. We showed dirty roller towels on the wall, spittoons, garbage cans marked "No. 23," the common drinking cup, the common sponge, the feather duster, the broom—emphasizing as much as possible the bad features of such things. We had a large rat trap containing the rats which the women have been wearing in their hair so much of late. A garbage barrel filled with broken bottles and tin cans was called the "Germ-ania Theater," and the play announced was "The Place, the Man, and the Germ."

These things as we presented them were quite amusing. They catch the popular eye and at the same time give a great amount of instruction to those who have never thought on such matters before. This play is being revised and improved, and during the coming year is to be put on the stage by professionals. I am sure this sort of work will do an enormous amount of good in educating the public.

But the height of cruelty and folly seems to have been reached by the Kansas State Board of Health. It has published a "health almanac." In its number of December, 1911, the board assumes to let the people know what diseases they may look forward to each month in the year. It opens with a repulsive picture of a woman cruelly pitted with smallpox, with the statement under it, "Never vaccinated." But this is not really the worst of it. They take a page of their so-called almanac for a disease with the following headings: "January for smallpox, February for pneumonia, March for measles, April for whooping cough, May for good wells and good water," with the cheering statement for May that—

Bad or impure water is more dangerous than the deadliest poison and always affects those who drink it. Wells are polluted by organic matter getting into them. This matter comes from human beings or from animals and is always bad for those who drink it. If it comes from a case of typhoid or from a person who carries typhoid germs and gets into the well it will produce typhoid fever in those who drink it.

June for infants' complaints, July for flies and mosquitoes, August for typhoid fever, September for diphtheria, October for scarlet fever, November for colds and influenza, and December for consumption.

These doctors, if they are worthy of the name, know that two great causes of disease are fear and suggestion and that suggestion is the prolific cause of fear, disease, and death. And yet they deliberately send out broadcast, at public expense, a suggestion—probably a false one, but that makes no difference—that in each month of the year a specific and deadly disease may be expected and feared. It is the refinement of cruelty and the depth of ignorance in a matter of life and death if it is not malicious.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask from what the Senator was reading a few moments ago? My attention was diverted.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator refer to the last extract I was reading?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. WORKS. That is from a health almanac issued by the board of health of the State of Kansas. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator from California permit me to make one suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I would suggest to our genial and happy friend from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], with that staring him in the face, that he might move at once to New Jersey. We will offer him a calendar of life, health, happiness, and prosperity all the year round. Come and be one of us.

Mr. WORKS. This persistent suggestion of disease and its alleged causes is creating more disease and sacrificing more lives than are all the germs that have been discovered or imagined by man.

Mr. President, I said a moment ago that I thought the height of cruelty and folly had been reached by the State board of health of Kansas, but I have discovered something even worse than that. What is called "A circular for school children" has been distributed in some of the schools of this country that seems to me to go further in the way of spreading improper information than anything I have yet seen. It pictures a small boy examining disease germs through a microscope. The circular says:

> Then there are so many bad fairies which cause disease. Different kinds of them cause different diseases. * * * These little fairies are called bacteria or germs and are the smallest of all living things. They are found everywhere—in the air, the soil, the water, in our bodies. A quart of well water would contain a million of them.

Then follow illustrations of the different kinds of deadly disease germs with a statement under each group of the diseases they cause. Then the circular undertakes, by illustration, to show how the germs of tuberculosis are carried. The point of a pencil is pictured, covered with such germs as come from the mouth of the victim, and the picture of a fly is set out with its legs loaded with disease germs. A picture of a sick man in his invalid chair is given, with children taking some of his food from a spoon, with the statement under it: "The germs that attack us come from the bodies of the sick." Other pictures of the means by which disease is conveyed are given.

An emaciated consumptive, apparently in the last stage of the disease, is pictured as spitting upon the floor, and a woman sweeping up the sputum after it has dried. A little child is pictured as sitting near by, with the statement under this picture, "The germs may enter the bodies of children playing on the floor." Two persons are pictured as sitting at a table, one of them a consumptive, with the statement below it, "Others may get the disease by breathing"; and still another case, a small boy, emaciated by the disease, taking a bite of something, with two healthy-looking little fellows standing by, saying, "Give us a bite," with the statement under this picture, "Putting food, money, pencils, etc., into the mouth after a consumptive has poisoned them with his spit."

Now, Mr. President, I can not conceive of anything more cruel and inhuman than the loading of the minds of little children with such information as this. Physical ill treatment or abuse can not be compared to it, and yet I find the superintendents and teachers of the schools and boards of education not only permitting this sort of literature to go into the schools but actually encouraging it. They may be partially excused by their apparent ignorance of the palpable consequences of such impressions upon the minds of the young, because like a good many other people in this country they do not think for themselves or try to understand the effects of such suggestions as this circular contains, but accept it because the doctors approve it. I am sorry to bring to even the attention of the United States Senate such brutal and inhuman suggestions; and when one thinks of filling the minds of children with this kind of stuff, it is nothing less than horrifying.

Fortunately, some public officials, not doctors, are humane and sensible enough to attempt to stay this fearful filling of the minds of children with these hideous details of disease. The mayor of San Francisco, Cal., is one of these. I submit for the consideration of the Senate an editorial in the San Francisco Star of February 12, 1912:

A WORD FOR THE MICROBES.

> Here are recent words of Mayor Rolph that are commended to your consideration:
> "I think you should go slow about the methods of eradicating tuberculosis. I hear so many mothers in the mission say that this tuberculosis scare has been so driven into the minds of their children that they come home saying they are filled with aches and pains, and have backaches and stomach aches and one thing and another. I heard this discussed last night, and that germs of every human ill have been shown on magic-lantern slides—pictures that make children get the idea that their bodies are covered with germs. I do think that you ought to be very careful to first study out well the effect of all this and prevent what is evidently intended to make children think they are filled with all kinds of diseases, when you know, as a matter of fact, they are not, and that what you are really trying to do is only to prevent disease."
> Amen. Also hallelujah and God save us. The mayor is right. A child may be scared into sickness as well as safeguarded against it. We have overworked the microbes, poor things. They are good, bad, and indifferent, but no matter how irreproachable their character our children have been indirectly inoculated with the idea that they should be regarded as malefactors and goblins.
> The fact is that man has slowly educated himself up to the point where he is scared to death by death. This is why 10,000 fads of healing bud and blossom in our midst. I remember very well when a stomach ache was cured by Jamaica ginger and a mustard plaster. Now the chances are that nothing but removing the vermiform appendix will do the business; after that, if one has a stomach ache he may try the old remedies.
> Again, the mayor is right. We show our kids pictures in which human flesh is portrayed as the grazing ground of all sorts of apparent antediluvian monsters. What wonder if the half-formed minds of the children get the idea that there is not much hope for them; if they are "filled with aches and pains and have backaches and stomach aches"? Deuce take it! how can they expect anything else with megatheriums and other bacilli at work?

The Ohio State Journal in its issue of November 27, 1911, contained this sensible editorial on this subject:

THINKING HEALTH.

> We find this very suggestive paragraph in a book entitled "Philosophy of Self-Help":
> "The most prevalent and the most dangerous of all forms of infection is mental. It is far easier to get bacteria out of the body than to eradicate disease germs from the mind once they get in. Thinking and talking about disease prepare the mental soil for its reception. Fear and expectancy promote its growth."
> We apply this thought to medical inspection of schools, which tends to fill the minds of the children with thoughts of disease. It is entirely uneducational to do so. It is the easiest thing in the world to transfer an ailment of the body into a disease of the mind, and when that becomes a child's condition, he goes through the schools carrying a heavy load. And that condition of the mind tends to promote disease. One disturbs the free activity of the mind by turning it in on physical ills.
> The best hope of health is to think health, and that suggests the sort of education a child is entitled to. It will be a hard matter for even a well child to grow grand and good out of a consciousness of surrounding physical ills.

Mr. President, the doctors are using every means possible to get themselves into the schools. They are trying to teach unthinking people that this is necessary to the public health. What a dreadful mistake! The presence of the doctor who thinks nothing and talks nothing but disease, is full of fear of microbes and the thousands of causes of disease that had better never have been known, is little better than a death's head in the schoolroom. Better have someone to teach the children that good is more powerful than evil; that we make disease by thinking it; and to be thinking of better and higher things than the material causes of disease. This will never be a healthy Nation until the people are freed mentally from this dreadful, all-pervading fear of disease. Men and women burdened with all these false beliefs and fears are slaves to their wrong view of life.

Mr. President, this nefarious onslaught on young children and the spread of disease through suggestion and fear has grown worse and worse. And now the Government is to be asked to become a party to this spreading of disease by collecting and disseminating like information for the whole country to read. What a fearful responsibility must rest upon the people who are disseminating such information.

Every doctor worthy of the name knows that fear is one of the most prolific causes of disease. He knows, too, that suggestion of disease is equally deadly in its effects, especially on the timid and fearful. And yet, with full knowledge of this, they set about in the most direct and forceful way to suggest the existence and presence of the very diseases they claim to be combating and to implant in the minds of the old and young the fear that engenders the disease. If the evidence of this cruel wrong was not so direct and positive it would be beyond belief. A very interesting article on the effects of fear, by Dr. Orison Swett Marden, was published in the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin February 24, 1912, and is worthy of the attention of the Senate. It is as follows:

> Fear in all its different phases of expression, such as worry, anxiety, anger, jealousy, timidity, is the greatest enemy of the human race. It has robbed man of more happiness and efficiency, has made more men cowards, more people failures, or forced them into mediocrity, than anything else.
> Fear has a paralyzing, blighting influence upon the whole being. It impoverishes the blood and destroys health by impairing the digestion, cutting off nutrition, and lowering the physical and mental vitality. It crushes hope, kills courage, and so enfeebles the mind's action that it can not create or produce.
> Many people are afraid of nearly everything. They are afraid of a draft, afraid of getting chilled or taking cold, afraid to eat what they want, to venture in business matters for fear of losing their money, afraid of public opinion. They have a perfect horror of what Mrs.

Grundy thinks. They are afraid hard times are coming, afraid of poverty, afraid of failure, afraid the crops are going to fail, afraid of lightning and tornadoes. Their whole lives are filled with fear, fear, fear.

* * * * * * *

Fear strangles originality, daring, boldness; it kills individuality and weakens all the mental processes. Great things are never done under a sense of fear of some impending danger. All work done when one is suffering from a sense of fear or foreboding has little efficiency. Fear always indicates weakness, the presence of cowardice. What a slaughterer of years, what a sacrificer of happiness and ambitions, what a ruiner of careers this monster has been!

One of the worst forms of fear is that of a foreboding of some evil to come, which hangs over the life like a threatening cloud over a volcano before an eruption.

Some people are always suffering from this peculiar phase of fear. They are apprehensive that some great misfortune is coming to them, that they are going to lose their money or their position; or they are afraid of accident or that some fatal disease is developing in them. If their children are away, they see them in all sorts of catastrophes—railroad accidents or shipwrecks. They are always picturing the worst.

* * * * * * *

The fear habit shortens life, for it impairs all the physiological processes. Its power is shown by the fact that it actually changes the chemical composition of the secretions of the body. Fear victims not only age prematurely, but they also die prematurely. Oh, how many victims fear has put into the grave. It has driven people into all sorts of crime through unbalancing the mind. It has caused terrible tragedies in human life.

There is not a single redeeming feature about fear or any of its numerous progeny. It is always, everywhere, an unmitigated curse.

A man who is filled with fear is not a real man. He is a puppet, a manikin, an apology of a man.

Quit fearing things that may never happen, just as you would quit any bad practice which has caused you suffering.

Mr. President, the dangers of disease and death are kept constantly in the public mind. People are warned to avoid this and shun that, and taught to believe this means one disease and that another, until the weak in body or mind are brought under the influence of this powerful suggestion and the strong are not always able to throw it off. Man is afraid of the food he eats, the water he drinks, and the air he breathes. Possessed with fear, he shuns certain foods that he thinks are hurtful, he shuts out the fresh air, and drinks boiled or bottled water. He has become a very craven, the slave of his unreasonable fears. I have heard a Member of this body declare that he could not ride from the Capitol to the Office Building in a closed subway without taking cold, and therefore he walked while others rode. Another is afraid to take a drink of ice water, because if he drinks it it paralyzes the stomach. Last summer when the thermometer hovered about 90 the Sergeant at Arms had electric fans placed in the Senate to relieve the heat, but if one was put in motion it was ordered stopped. Some one was afraid it would give him cold. And so it would, probably; not because a little fresh air could give anyone cold, but because of his fears. If he could learn not to be afraid, and no one else were afraid for him, he would never take cold. Job said, "That which I greatly feared hath come upon me." So it is with the man of to-day. To fear disease is to invite it. Disease is wholly mental. The material body, without mind, has no sensation. Destroy consciousness and the body does not feel. The condition of mind reacts on the body and makes it sick or well, according to the thought either of the individual or others who think about him. Hatred, malice, revenge, fear, and other wrong thoughts are the breeders of disease. Every competent physician will tell you so. And yet these same physicians are doing more to excite the fears of the people than everybody else. And they are here now, urging Congress to authorize the Government to put out printed information that will feed the fears of the people of the whole Nation and engender more diseases and sacrifice more lives than ever the doctors will heal or save. If the people could once be taught to think and talk health and not disease, harmony and not discord, faith and trust and not fear, life and not death, a health department need not be thought of. If the people could only be taught to trust in an omnipotent and good God instead of the doctor and his remedies, and thereby cast off all fear, disease would be unknown. To one having some of this faith and trust that dispels fear in the degree that one trusts and understands, the thought that is bestowed upon disease, sickness, and death, and the power that is given to them in the human mind is little less than appalling.

Mr. President, I can not keep silent and allow this Nation to become a party to this monstrous propaganda of fear and devastation of its people.

Some of the doctors have realized this and sounded a warning. Dr. P. L. Myer, of Toledo, Ohio, in an article published in the Journal of the American Medical Association as far back as 1906, says:

Had we not better hedge a little before the great lay mind grasps the fact that they were frightened into panicky laws and restrictions over will-o'-the-wisp possibilities and not probabilities or actualities?

* * * * * * *

With all the wonderful strides of our science in 100 years, we still have the public as abjectly cowed to-day, before the omnipotent hosts of bacteria, as it was by the evil spirits and ghosts and witches of a past century.

And in 1910 the Journal of the American Medical Association has this very pertinent statement of prevailing conditions:

An aversion to unnecessary contamination by noxious microorganisms may well serve as a protection against disease; but an insane terror of infection may make life very miserable without appreciably lengthening or strengthening it. In the first place, the paradise of faultless prophylaxis—the aseptic Eden which seems to be the ideal of the germophobes—is unattainable. We can not banish microorganisms from our human world; we can only try to keep that balance of conditions most favorable to the life of the human organism. In the second place, the attitude of mind, cultivated in the perpetual endeavor to evade disease, may be almost a worse evil than the disease itself; certainly it furnishes the best excuse for the existence of those sects which deny the existence of all disease and the usefulness of any precautions. "Life is a dangerous thing at best, and very few of us get out of it alive," while those of us who spend all our energies trying to elude its incidental risks might almost as well never have lived at all. Health is largely a matter of a proper balance of opposing forces, and that balance can be preserved, in part, by cultivating a due measure of indifference to inevitable dangers.

From the Ohio Medical Journal of July, 1898, after commenting upon the annual meeting of the American Medical Association of that year, this is interesting:

The political part of the convention continues to be managed by medical politicians; these gentlemen constitute a sect apart, coming chiefly from St. Louis and Louisville, and who come with everything cut and dried.

To which the Atlantic Medical Weekly of August 6, replied:

But granting it, * * * most of the members attend the sessions of the American Medical Association for other reasons and with other purposes than to engage in political bickerings, and are only too glad there are others to do this work for them. * * * They get but an empty honor, forgotten before the next session, and have a great deal of labor for their pains.

WOULD FORCE LEGISLATION.

From a report of the one hundred and third annual meeting of the Medical Society of the State of New York, held at Albany, January, 1909, and published in the Journal of the American Medical Association, February 6, 1909:

If the incoming national administration fails to establish a national department of health the public health committees of the State medical societies should add their force in making public sentiment sufficiently strong to force this movement through.

Dr. Larkin, of Hillsboro, Ohio, in an address to his local county society, a branch of the American Medical Association, said:

We want to make the influence of the county society so strong that no decent, self-respecting physician can be without its portals. We want to make its local influence so great that no legislator can ignore its warnings, and when we ask in the name of humanity that certain laws be enacted for the general good they will heed our demands and be only ready to do our commands.

From the remarks of Dr. H. A. Beaudoux, president of the North Dakota State Medical Association, at the twenty-second annual session of the same, held at Fargo, May, 1909, and published in the Journal of the American Medical Association, June 5, 1909:

We are better equipped to pass sane and important legislation than any other body of men and to make ourselves felt in public matters owing to our intimate relations, as family physicians and advisers, with the voters throughout the State.

It seems that Prof. Irving Fisher, who was chairman of the committee of one hundred, must have had some doubt of the sincerity and unselfish humanitarianism of the American Medical Association, for in Dr. McCormack's report of the executive committee, June, 1910, at St. Louis, he has this to say about the professor:

I was impressed at the outset of our acquaintance that he had not seen the best side of our profession and had some of the prejudices, only more frankly expressed, of the average layman as to its aims and attainments; and asked him to make the same careful study of its plans of organizations and purposes that he had given to other problems, with the result that he soon became one of our most appreciated friends.

Of Senator OWEN he writes:

Soon another great layman, Senator ROBERT L. OWEN, of Oklahoma, entered the lists as our official advocate in the National Senate. * * * It has been one of the greatest privileges of my life to be intimately associated with these two lay friends of ours, OWEN and Fisher, etc.

Sometimes some more conservative counsels intervened, but they were promptly suppressed. At a council of the association an attempt was made by one of their number to check the political activities of the organization, but it was a melancholy failure. The following account of it appeared in the Illinois Medical Journal of March, 1912:

Dr. Henry B. Favill, of Chicago, presided and uttered an address which was quite remarkable, and led up to the most dramatic climax it has ever been our privilege to witness. Dr. Favill's remarks were to the effect that the activities of the profession in political matters had brought about considerable criticism from a portion of the public. We had been accused among other things of being "a professional trust," of using "trade-union methods," etc. Because of these disagreeable statements Dr. Favill thought it the part of wisdom to at once abandon our efforts along political lines and depend altogether on our efforts to educate the people. * * *

THE DRAMATIC CLIMAX.

Scarcely had the chairman taken his seat, ready to call for the next order of business, when Dr. J. M. McCormack, of Kentucky, sprang to his feet, and in eloquent language called attention to the stand taken by the parent organization at the Los Angeles meeting. The representatives of the organized profession, duly elected and clothed with plenary power, had pledged the organization at its annual meeting to a continuation of the contest which it had commenced, and instructed its committees and its journal to use their utmost endeavors to procure the passage of the Owen bill. If it should go out to the public that this conference, after all that had been said and done, had to-day taken a different stand, and should by its silence give consent to the doctrinaire sentiments of the chairman, a blow would be struck at the good faith of the profession from which it would never recover. Mr. OWEN, who had taken his life and his political fortune in his hands in advocating our cause, would go down to a disgraceful defeat, and the blood of this sacrifice would be on our hands.

It has been the studied effort of the American Medical Association to secure teachers, particularly in the public schools, to cooperate with them. In this way they could reach the young people and bring them under their influence, thereby securing the influence of the teachers themselves as affecting public sentiment. Dr. McCormack, who was the leading spirit in all efforts to extend their organization and increase its strength and influence, had this to say on that subject at the Atlantic City session in June, 1909:

I am constantly impressed with the possibilities of this work before educational bodies and schools, and especially in institutions which are engaged in preparing teachers, editors, lawyers, clergymen, and other leaders of public opinion for their life work. The popular distrust of the profession, ordinarily passive but ready to become active and to be utilized by the various quack and other antagonistic interests, can scarcely be overestimated, and probably can never be eradicated from the once infected adult mind. The experience of recent years has convinced me that with the aid of the teachers and schools, an aid which will be ours for the asking anywhere, a generation of voters and legislators can soon be so trained that the vast interests represented by preventive medicine will come to be appreciated as among the most important and cheaply and easily conserved of the Nation's resources, the unselfish aims and purposes of the profession will be recognized, and constructive statesmanship can be submitted for the time-serving political methods which have so long obtained in our public affairs, local, State, and National. For these and other reasons which can not be enlarged on here, I would urge such an alliance between physicians and teachers in every section of the country as will make all that it involves in our work matters of common knowledge. In short, the future, as I see it, was never so full of promise, if the people can be frankly taken into our confidence and more sense and greater dignity can be made to obtain in our relations with the public and public affairs.

The doctor seemed to be impressed with the idea, evidently well founded, that the doctors composing the organization are not in public favor. He seemed to think that an alliance with a respectable body like the teachers would relieve them from this feeling of distrust. Unfortunately, too many teachers have unwittingly been made the instruments of the association for such a purpose.

The following article entitled "The county board of health," by Dr. W. S. Rankin, secretary of the State board of health of Raleigh, N. C., shows something of the length to which they are going in the effort to mold public sentiment and secure outside help:

EDUCATIONAL WORK.

Here is a vast field of unlimited possibilities wherein the board of health may do its most important work.

The educational efforts of the board of health have three possible agencies through which to find expression, the public school, the pulpit, and the press.

The receptive and pliable mind of developing citizenship is the most prolific soil in which to sow the seed of sanitary regeneration. Certainly there is nothing more vital to the future welfare of all the people than that our school children shall be taught the value of health, that it is fundamental to all other possessions, and that it is a thing that can be easily conserved or easily wasted. There is a law that requires our public schools to teach Ritchie's Primer of Sanitation to all pupils in the seventh grade. County boards of health should see to it that this law is rigidly observed.

In the December Bulletin we suggested the purchase by the county of an acetylene lantern and slides. The entire outfit can be obtained for $100. If the county board of health would invite the cooperation of the county medical society and work out with that organization a program of lectures to be given by the members of the county medical society to the various public schools in the county, nothing would go further in arousing the sanitary conscience of the county. The lectures should be given at night in the public schoolhouses. A week preceding the lecture the county superintendent of schools should forward to the teacher of the school a quantity of handbills announcing the lecture, and these could be distributed through the school children throughout the community. If the county medicial society does not care itself to prepare a set of standard lectures on important sanitary subjects, the State board of health will be very glad to furnish these lectures already prepared, so that little time will need to be given the matter by the individual members of the county medicial society. For fuller detail in regard to this plan see 313 of the December (1911) Bulletin.

Another very effective method for emphasizing the importance of the study of sanitation in the schools and for securing the interest of the children, and one that has been put to extensive use by many progressive communities, is the offering of prizes for compositions on public health subjects. Asheville, Wilmington, and Smithfield, among other towns in North Carolina, have adopted this idea. A county in Alabama obtained such splendid results in increasing the interest of the people in matters of sanitation through a series of prizes offered in the public schools of the county for compositions on tuberculosis, sanitation, flies, etc., as to have attracted national attention. What has been done in Alabama can be done in North Carolina.

The county medical society should use its influence with the newspapers of their county to secure the publication of articles bearing upon public health. The newspapers of North Carolina recognize the importance of this public opinion and are lending the use of their columns unstintedly for the promotion of public health. County boards of health should keep the editor of the county paper informed in regard to local conditions and events that affect the public health. The State board of health prepares weekly newspaper articles on the subject of public health and sends them to all the newspapers of the State. If your county paper has not been publishing some of these articles, the board of health might call attention to the possible oversight and use its influence in securing more frequent references to this matter, which should deeply concern the public.

Mr. President, the full title of Ritchie's primer, referred to in the last article, is "Primer of sanitation: Being a simple work on disease germs and how to fight them." And the following are the subjects treated in this so-called work on sanitation:

Why the study of disease germs is important.
The cells of the body.
Disease germs and how they get into the body.
The struggle between the body and the germs.
Bacteria.
The skin.
The pus-forming bacteria.
Tetanus (lockjaw).
The air passages and the lungs.
Diphtheria.
Pneumonia.
Influenza, whooping cough, and colds.
Tuberculosis.
The treatment of consumption.
Disease germs in dust.
The alimentary canal.
Typhoid fever.
Diseases caused by relatives of the typhoid germ.
Other bacterial diseases of the intestines.
Disease germs in water.
Other bacterial diseases.
Protozoa.
Malarial fever and yellow fever.
Mosquitoes.
Smallpox.
Other protozoan diseases.
Intestinal worms.
The importance of sanitation.
The housefly.
Disease germs in food.
Disinfection.
Unhygienic habits.
Public sanitation.
What governments can do to preserve the public health.
Practical sanitation.

This is the kind of reading that is being offered to the children of the country and attempted to be forced upon them, for the study of the book has already been made compulsory in the State of North Carolina and, I understand, in some other States.

There has been much complaint that the earnings of the doctors have been falling off. Hence the extraordinary efforts through political means and unjust restrictive legislation to retrieve their fortunes. At the meeting of the San Francisco Medical Society in January, 1899, Dr. Charles G. Kuhlman read a paper in which he showed that the average earning capacity of California's 3,000 doctors should be $5,000 each per annum, but because "irregular" physicians were allowed to practice and of bad debts it was only $850, or one-sixth of what it should be, entailing a loss to the "regular" doctors of that State alone of $10,000,000 per annum.

That was certainly a bad showing for the regulars. He urged as a remedy "a better organization of the medical profession into a distinct corporation and which should be, to be perfect in its results, not merely local or State but national in its character." The doctor's advice was taken. Now the regulars have just such an organization as he hoped for, and it has not hesitated to use every means within its reach, political and otherwise, to circumvent the irregulars and put them out of business. To this end they have spent millions of dollars, and the people are no better off, nor have the regulars increased their earning capacity or increased for themselves the public respect or confidence. Their case is no better, but seemingly worse, than it was before, as indicated by the following extract from the New York State Journal of Medicine of March 12, 1910:

The profession has not fared well at the hands of legislators. The legislation secured to elevate the standard of the profession and protect the public from quacks has resulted, with the help of the same legislatures, in turning turkish-bath rubbers into doctors, and the optician has succeeded in usurping some of the most delicate functions of the physician. If the legislature continues to license successive schools of quackery, we may well question the wisdom of State control of license to practice medicine. On account of this and on account of the general education in hygiene and preventive medicine, the income of the profession has been greatly diminished. The remedy would be to increase the fees, but this could not be effected without thorough organization and loyalty to each other on the part of the doctors. The New York Journal says, further, that it is the universal opinion that an agreement in regard to fees would not be respected, and that this assertion is striking proof that there is real distress in our ranks and that medicine is degenerating into a vulgar game of grab or sordid struggle for mere existence.

This shows a very distressing condition of things for the regulars; but it never seems to occur to them that the error may be with them. It is inconceivable to them that they could by any possibility be "irregular" and some other mode of healing the true or even a better one than theirs. It is not theirs to learn, but to stick dogmatically to the contention that no one can be right but them. Other people have seen their error and the falsity of their ideas of healing, but they seem incapable of appreciating a patent fact that millions of people have learned to their inestimable advantage.

Mr. President, there is still another side of this important question that should not be allowed to escape the attention of the Senate. It is this: I have already pointed out that the medical activity of the Government in all its branches is in the hands of and completely under the influence and control of one school of medicine, and every publication sent out as information coming from the National Government is now, and will continue to be under this bill, the views of one school of medicine, and that a school which has been largely discredited. When the Government becomes the publisher and distributor of information obtained by and relating to this school of medicine, it establishes a State medicine and makes it strictly sectarian. This is bound to continue just so long as one school of medicine is intrusted with the management of health matters. It may be said that this bill provides against discrimination as between different schools of medicine. But while the bureau is under the control of one school and no physician or surgeon of any other school is employed by the Government, such a provision amounts to nothing. The Government has maintained this sectarianism in medicine for over 40 years. Its health activities have been completely dominated by one sect to the exclusion of all others.

The Government has no more right to sanction or support sectarianism in medicine than in religion. One is just as much of a violation of the freedom of the citizen as the other. There are millions of people in this country who believe in the homeopathic and eclectic modes of healing, and millions more who do not believe in drug healing of any kind. But not one of these has any recognition whatever by the Government as represented by the present medical bureaus, nor will they have under this bill if it becomes a law.

By these publications the Government is simply promoting the views of one school of medicine to the exclusion of all others. And worse still, they are not a report of established or known facts, but of mere opinions opposed to the views of other equally competent schools of medicine, and generally found in the end to be erroneous. Such a publicity bureau shuts out the views, opinions, investigations, and discoveries of every other school of medicine, composed, in part, of some of the ablest men and brightest minds in the country. If we take the publications of the present health bureaus, and the people of this country were dependent upon them for their information, they would never know that a homeopathic, eclectic, or any other school of medicine or healing existed. And if the bureaus should speak on the subject, it would be to discredit any school but the one. If such publications are of any use to the public, they should be made nonsectarian and inform the people of every discovery, advance, or change in health affairs from whatever source and without bias or prejudice.

This could never be expected from present bureaus or any consolidation of them. The chief reason is that this legislation is sought by and in the interest of one school of medicine. No other school is asking for or favors it. The people do not ask for it and do not understand it.

SERUM THERAPY.

Mr. President, the old school of medicine has now taken up the idea of serum therapy, so called, or the prevention of disease by inoculation of supposed disease-preventing serums extracted from diseased animals. In the case of smallpox we have had this alleged preventive for many years. The efficacy of vaccination has never been proved. It has from the beginning been stoutly denied, and ample proof has been given that it is not a preventive, notwithstanding the National Government, and State, county, and city authorities compel the people, including young children, to submit to the poisoning of their blood by this loathsome treatment. The National Government forces it upon its soldiers and sailors by the strictest penalties. Children whose parents are opposed to it are denied school privileges, and other penalties are imposed to compel submission to vaccination, whether the people want it or not. It is almost beyond belief that any enlightened Government would thus trespass upon the liberties and personal rights of its citizens in such ways upon the mere opinion of doctors, and opinions that have never been substantiated, but have been discredited and disproved over and over again. And now the doctors say typhoid fever can be prevented by a serum that has been discovered lately, and the Government at once accepts this opinion and forces it upon its soldiers, sailors, and employees. Then the school children will be forced to accept this new and equally dangerous system of poisoning. Like remedies are being discovered for other diseases, until everybody will have to submit to have his body inoculated with various poisons, on the theory that he will thus be made immune from every known disease. The whole thing is too absurd to talk about. It results from the fact that the doctors have learned that the old remedies will neither prevent nor heal disease, and they are losing their business and public confidence. The administration of these pretended preventive remedies is a very lucrative business, and when people are compelled to take them it is easy to get patients.

The practice of vaccination is condemned by physicians and scientists and all classes of people. The following from the late Moncure D. Conway, one of the great men of this country, illustrates what men of learning and information think about it:

A considerable number of good people are just now suffering fines and imprisonments because they will not suffer their children to be vaccinated. Their very excellencies as parents cause them to be dealt with as malefactors. Here, say, are two men: One gives uninquiring assent to what other thoughtless people assent to; he doesn't care much what happens to his child, delegates to usage the duty of thinking for it, gives it up to be baptised, catechised, vaccinated, flogged at school—to anything that is usual, whether right or not. The other man gives no uninquiring assent; he studies carefully that his family may be nourished with truth and maintained by such laws of health as he can discover. Now, of these two the careless parent is favored by the vaccination law, while the thoughtful, anxious, and devoted parent is punished unless he adopt a prescribed opinion. A law which thus favors parental indifference and discourages careful thought and conscientious devotion to the child's welfare reverses the spirit of all just laws. Of course it is equally probable that the thinking parent may be able to agree with the majority; but he may not, and in this case he suffers for his inquiry, while the other escapes—no man being so safe from the results of thought, erroneous or right, as he who never thinks at all.

Vaccination has been seriously challenged by men of learning. The misgivings concerning it have not arisen from ignorance and prejudice, but from men of science and medical men. These arguments have been sufficiently strong to shake the convictions of eminent thinkers and political leaders—such as Herbert Spencer, Prof. F. W. Newman, Dr. Garth Wilkinson, William Ewart Gladstone, W. E. Forster, John Bright—in the justice of the law, and of some of them in vaccination itself. The arguments which have influenced such men—leaders of large numbers of people—can not be met justly except by fact and argument. To answer by mere force is tyranny. The reasoning objectors have been answered only by fine and imprisonment, which are as genuinely persecutions as if inflicted for the nonbaptism of children, on the ground that such children may become foci of heretical infection. To those who dissent from it vaccination is merely a medical dogma. To coerce parents into its practice rests upon that assumption of medical infallibility which has again and again been proved false, as in the instance of inoculation, once generally practiced, now penal; as in the example of bleeding, that barbarous practice to which Washington and Cavour fell victims while opening new vistas of civilization. Even were physicians unanimous in their faith in vaccination, they could not claim infallibility after having so often erred, while, as a matter of fact, there is less unanimity in that profession about vaccination than there was at one time in favor of the now discredited inoculation.

And this is the way the Government punishes its citizens for presuming to deny the right of its officers to poison their blood by this process:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.]

MEDICAL TYRANNY IN NAVY.

Resistance to the advice and instructions of medical officers in the Army or Navy is construed as insubordination as serious as resistance to the orders of other commissioned officers. Because they refused to submit themselves to the new antityphoid inoculation, a number of the crew of the battleship Vermont, in Cuban waters, are being punished as virtual mutineers.

There was a time when disobedience to the orders of a chaplain involved as grave consequences to members of the organized military forces. Army and Navy policies which make mutineers of faithful men with intelligence and individuality enough to object to the introduction of noisome, poisonous substances into healthy bodies can not command popular approval.

If vaccinations for various diseases were prescribed a condition at the time of enlistment, the men would have the option of consenting to it or declining to enter the service. To impose after enlistment vaccination on men in violation of their will and judgment is a misuse of military authority. It can not be justified on the ground of necessity in the absence of an epidemic. So far as typhoid is concerned, it can be combated in entirely unobjectionable ways through sanitation.

This is a subject with which Congress should deal.

When one comes to consider this subject, the evidences against its compulsory imposition are so numerous that one can select but few of them for use in an address of this kind. No one can truthfully deny that thousands of lives, many of them of little children, have been sacrificed to this vile practice. But, again, the people do not or will not think for themselves. To them the opinion of some doctor who knows no more than they do about it is sufficient and they go no further. Those who do think for themselves and refuse to submit to the treatment for their children must lose their right to send them to the public schools. If the doctors agreed about it, it would not be so bad. But they do not. Many of the ablest doctors of all times since it came into use have denied that it is of any value and assert that it is a most dangerous remedy. In an appeal to the people of Pennsylvania by certain inhabitants of Bangor, Northampton County, they say:

The inhabitants of Bangor, Northampton County, in public meeting assembled, on Friday evening, March 29, 1907, issue this appeal to the people of Pennsylvania to join with them in restoring the principles of civil liberty in this Commonwealth, which have been outraged by the enforcement of the compulsory vaccination laws.

On November 5 last, one of the brightest and best of children, Hershel, the 8-year-old son of Frank N. Love, a respected citizen of Bangor, was vaccinated in order to obtain admission to school, as required by the 12th section of the act of June 18, 1895. Within 17 days he was dead, after suffering what no tongue can tell. The poison was put into his little body, but the doctors could not get it out.

The father and mother of this victim of State-enforced blood poisoning have one remaining child, a little girl, who is now of school age. But a cruel law, which still remains unrepealed upon the statute books of this State, denies to this child the right of education guaranteed by our Constitution, unless her already grief-stricken parents again make a sacrifice to the Moloch of vaccination.

The tendency of vaccination to spread smallpox and its worthlessness as a preventive have been illustrated in our own State, where the disease has been most prevalent and fatal in those localities where vaccination has been general. In Philadelphia during the 10 years immediately preceding the enforcement of the vaccination school law, from 1885 to 1894, there were 113 deaths from smallpox, while during the four years from 1901 to 1904, when the law was being strictly enforced, there died in the Municipal Hospital of smallpox 760 persons. It is estimated that the vaccinations performed during that outbreak were about 500,000 in number. In Marietta, where vaccine is manufactured from the virus of smallpox, there were more than 50 cases in 1905. But in Erie, where it has been found impossible to enforce vaccination, there has been only one death from smallpox in 25 years, and in Waynesboro, where the entire population is opposed to vaccination, there has not been a case of smallpox since the Civil War, nor a death from that disease for 64 years.

The spread of smallpox is, however, one of the least of the evils chargeable against vaccination, for physicians who have independently investigated the subject tell us that the words of Scripture, that "The life of all flesh is the blood thereof," are literally true, and that the corruption of the blood defiles the fountain of life, making disease necessary to purify the system and prevent degeneration. Vaccination stands indicted by the common sense of mankind, the teachings of religion, and the voices of the world's greatest scientists and sanitarians, including Alexander von Humboldt, Florence Nightingale, John Pickering, Sir William J. Collins, Herbert Spencer, Alfred Russel Wallace, Alexander Milton Ross, Montague R. Leverson, Charles Creighton, Edgar M. Crookshank, and many others of like eminence. It has poisoned the blood of countless multitudes and placed upon its victims the stamp of consumption, syphilis, cancer, and many other terrible diseases.

If the functions of government were strictly limited to the exercise of its just powers, grounded in nature, and derived from the consent of the governed, and if all arbitrary authority were abolished, there would be no compulsory vaccination laws, and the history of Pennsylvania during the last two years would not have been sullied by the slaughter of Dale Iams, of Washington County; Lottie Bentzel, of Cumberland County; George Baker, of York County, John L. Hilt, of Lancaster County, Beatrice Bausonville, of Pittsburgh, and many other little innocents by State-enforced blood poisoning.

The attitude of certain political doctors who are members of the legislature in presuming to dictate to more than 6,000,000 people in this Commonwealth concerning their own flesh and blood, encouraged as it has been by the attempt of health officials to use the power and patronage of their offices to influence the course of legislation, we denounce as being opposed to the spirit of our institutions.

* * * * * * *

When a few political doctors, animated by the selfish and infamous desire of a clique in the medical profession to increase its profits by diseasing the entire population of this State, can block the remedial legislation demanded by an overwhelming majority of the people an issue is raised which must be carried to every hamlet and fireside. Shall a politico-medical oligarchy, supported by the public revenues, be permitted to compel any person to submit to a surgical operation, or shall the free institutions guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States be maintained in this Commonwealth? Shall a union of medicine and State be permitted to enslave the bodies of men, women, and children in a community in which the principles of religious liberty and toleration have been upheld for two centuries and more?

Mr. J. P. McLean has this to say in the Dayton (Ohio) News of October 26, 1910:

AGAINST VACCINATION.

EDITOR DAILY NEWS: I will avail myself of the opportunity of contributing an article on "Vaccination" for the reason that I believe that this cult is the greatest crime against nature ever recognized, and is far worse than war, famine, and pestilence. One article will not permit me to go into details, nor treat the subject as I would desire. The fact that antivaccination societies are numerous in Great Britain, America, and Canada and other countries, indicates that there is a widespread dissent and opposition to the cult. If to this be added the names of the greatest pathologists, physicians, surgeons, naturalists, statesmen, etc., then it is well to pause and consider. I will here confine myself to some of the reasons why the ranks of the opposition are extending, though I may not follow the natural sequence.

In all probability the opposition to the cult arises principally from the fact that it is a propagator of a fatal disease. This point is easily proven from the fact "that all lymph, however pellucid, does really contain blood cells." (Unanimous opinion of the Royal Commission on Vaccinations, final report, p. 112.) If, then, vaccine matter always contains blood cells, then whatever disease the source of the supply may have, will be propagated in the victim. Dr. Alexander Wilder, the most brilliant and versatile physician America ever produced, says: "Consumption follows in the footsteps of vaccination as directly as an effect ever follows a cause. The vaccine poison being the product of decaying animal tissue, and often tuberculosis in character, must naturally produce its like wherever it finds the suitable opportunity." (See his "Fallacy of Vaccination," p. 13.) He quotes from Prof. Bartlett, of the medicine department of the University of New York, who stated that "in 208 children who had been vaccinated, 38 died of tubercular consumption and 170 of other maladies. In 95 who were not vaccinated 30 only died of consumption and 63 of other diseases."

The Medical Times and Gazette, London, for January 1, 1854, called attention to the fact that consumption had widely spread since the introduction of vaccination. That during the 10 preceding years it had slain 68,204 in the metropolis alone. The report of the registrar general for 1669 gave the number of deaths at 53,794 from the cause alone. Dr. Wilder is supported by such men as St. Gervais, Hufeland, Hertwig, Grisolle, Constadt, Bedaur, who also enumerated about 30 more diseases.

Dr. Jasuco Copland (Dictionary of Medicine, vol. 3, pp. 140, 141) says: "Notwithstanding the laudation bestowed upon vaccination, I believe that as the lapse of time allows the fact to be more fully demonstrated it will be found to be a not unfruitful source of scrofula and tuberceles." Even Dr. Felix von Niemeyer says that vaccination in children may leave behind it the germs of a disposition to consumption (p. 22). He further adds: "I must protest against unconditional compulsory vaccination, particularly during the first two years of life." I might extend this, but enough has been said.

Cancer is another rapidly increasing disease. Does any person know even of a single case of this disease in a human being who was never vaccinated? It is a frightful disease, and fatal. Several years ago Dr. Wilder wrote in that of his own knowledge he knew this disease to be bovine. Hutchinson (Illustrations of Classical Surgery, vol. 1, p. 141) has illustrated a case of lupus in and around a vaccination scar, and cases of a like nature have been described by Besnier (Annales of Dermatologie at de Syphiligraphie, vol. 10, p. 576), Lennander (Upsala Lakareforennings Forhandlinger, vol. 25, pp. 65–70); and Colcott Fox (The Practitioner, vol. 6, p. 500).

Judging by reports, lockjaw is not uncommon after vaccination. I need only to refer to the statements of Dr. J. H. Cottman (New Orleans Medical and Surgical Journal, vol. 2, p. 783), Dr. George Ross (The Southern Clinic, vol. 1, p. 468), Dr. Theodore Dimon (St. Louis Courier of Medicine, vol. 7, p. 310), Dr. H. J. Berkeley (Maryland Medical Journal, vol. 9, p. 241), Dr. W. T. Bates (Transactions of the South Carolina Medical Association, vol. 32, p. 105), etc.

Without multiplying the list of diseases with accompanying references, I will conclude this portion of the article by stating that the celebrated physician, J. J. G. Wilkinson, gives a list of 56 different diseases caused by vaccination. Dr. Alfred R. Wallace, the most eminent of living naturalists, estimates that vaccination is the annual cause of 10,000 inocular diseases in Great Britain. I presume the Dayton library has his "Wonderful Century." If so, then read what he says on the vaccination delusion.

Perhaps it may be well at this point to call attention to Circular 147, issued June 16, 1909, by the Department of Agriculture, which relates to the outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease in cattle in Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Michigan during November, 1908. The origin of the disease was traced to 21 heifers which had been previously used for the production of vaccine virus.

It is believed that vaccination produces the soil for the propagation of smallpox. As vaccination is a septic poison, it would not be difficult to maintain this position.

Turning to the Brittanica, ninth edition, volume 24, page 29, we read that Prussia was the best vaccinated country in Europe in 1871, yet, during the epidemic of that year its mortality was higher (69,839) than any other northern State; that the Bavarian contingent, which was revaccinated without exception, had five times the death rate from smallpox than that of the Bavarian civil population; that in Bavaria in 1871, of 30,742 cases of smallpox, 29,429 with 3,994 deaths had been vaccinated; that at Bromley in 1881 there was a total of 43 cases, including 16 confluent, all vaccinated; that at Cologne in 1870 the first unvaccinated person attacked by smallpox was the one hundred and seventy-fourth in order of time; at Bonn the same year the forty-second; and at Liegnity in 1871 the two hundred and twenty-fifth. Take the recent cases in the United States Navy, where all are revaccinated, when the armored cruiser Washington was three days out (Jan. 22, 1910) from Yokohama, smallpox broke out and for three days treated as chickenpox. The vessel reached Honolulu on the 28th with three cases, one of which proved fatal. Here the ship was fumigated. The vessel left February 3, and by the 6th three cases developed, and on the 14th arrived at Port Townsend with five cases, where the patients were taken ashore, three of whom died. The vessel was held in quarantine until the 22d. The vessel arrived at San Francisco on March 4, reporting nine cases with four deaths.

By the advocates of the cult, Germany is pointed to with pride from being free from smallpox on account of her rigid laws for vaccination. Let us see. During the week ending July 9, 1910, in the British Parliament, a question was asked concerning a recent report of smallpox in Germany. The Right Hon. Sir John Burns, president of the local Government board, replied that in Prussia 690 cases, with 107 deaths, had been notified.

With the imperfect record above set forth there is sufficient evidence for us to believe with Lord Clifton that vaccination is "legal child murder," or with others who declare it to be a "ghastly delusion."

FRANKLIN, OHIO, October 26, 1910.

Mr. President, the facts and conditions are so clearly stated in this article and others that I have cited, that but little need be said by me. The sentiment against enforced vaccination is growing in volume and strength every day. It is supported only by fear and confidence in medical opinions on the subject, opinions actuated in the main by self-interest. Of course, there are many honest and conscientious people who believe in vaccination, and they are easily convinced of the preventive effects of other serum remedies. I venture to say, however, that there are very few competent doctors who believe in any of these remedies.

But, Mr. President, their inefficacy is not the worst of it. If this were all, they would at least be harmless; but it has been proved over and over again that they are worse than harmless—they are dangerous to health and life. Thousands of lives have been lost by the most violent and loathsome diseases by the use of these remedies. That is clearly shown by the communications I have just read. And the doctors are not only doubtful of the new serum remedies that are coming into use, but they are fearful of their effects in causing and transferring other and new diseases. They already have a new discase, called the "serum disease." The Hartford Times, as far back as 1908, had this to say on the subject, most of the facts being taken from the Inter-State Medical Journal:

DOCTORS ARE WORRIED OVER SERUM DISEASES—INJURIOUS SYMPTOMS FOUND TO FOLLOW INJECTIONS OF ANTITOXINS IN SOME CASES.

Physicians are discussing an ailment to which the name "serum disease" is now applied. The name is used to describe various groups of symptoms occurring after hypodermic injections of sera used to combat several acute diseases. The phenomena arising from the administration of normal, antitoxic or bactericidal serum at first were supposed to be harmless, but this has been disproved.

"Although manifest symptoms do not occur in more than one-third of all cases," says Dr. E. W. Saunders, of St. Louis, in the current issue of the Inter-State Medical Journal, "the cellular reaction to the alien serum is probably present in every individual who receives an injection, and the phenomena may be observed to a greater or less degree if the proper tests are made."

Dr. Saunders offers some practical rules in regard to the use of the various sera for the consideration of his fellow practitioners. He says: "Curative sera are not the harmless substances we originally supposed. Immunizing injections of serum should not be employed when isolation will prevent the disease with a reasonable degree of certainty and the children can be watched.

"Serum should not be used in asthmatics or those suffering from Grave's disease, or the lymphatic constitution, except in developed diphtheria. The use of bactericidal sera of doubtful value should not be encouraged without careful consideration of all the possible bad effects.

"If a second dose of serum must be given during the few weeks following a primary injection, small repeated doses are preferable to a large single dose.

"On the other hand, one large initial dose is probably less harmful and far more effective than several doses given over several days.

"THE SYMPTOMS.

"In some of the cases injected, varying from 10 to 40 per cent, after a period of 5 to 20 days, the patient becomes restless, and may complain of lassitude and pain in the limbs. This is soon followed by the serum exanthem, which is often acompanied by a severe itching and burning. The serum rash varies in character. Most often erythematous patches, rose red in color, will be found covering various parts of the body. Sometimes the eruption is distinctly scarlatiniform. Occasionally it resembles measles.

"A very striking symptom is edema of the skin, which may be present only in certain circumscribed spots or more rarely involve the whole integument, giving the person a ghastly, bloated appearance. A very serious form is the hemorrhagic type, in which hemorrhages occur in the skin. Fortunately this is rare.

"Joint pains are frequently observed. One or more of the joints may become very tender to touch and to movement. Muscular pains are very common. Articular swelling may be present. The wrists knees, hips, elbows, ankles, and shoulder are most frequently implicated.

"That the disease is a general disturbance is proved by the fact that an elevation of temperature is frequently present. The fever may be very high. Vomiting and diarrhea occur in a small portion of cases.

"In 1899, after repeated injections of diphtheria antitoxin in the babies of the Bethesda Foundlings' Home, I had the opportunity to observe in several cases the sensitizing effect of a previous injection.

"We found that many of the infants who had received an immunizing dose six weeks previously showed a very marked supersensibility to the second injection. The symptoms of serum disease, which are usually delayed a week or more, came on within a few minutes and with much greater violence. I reported these observations in the St. Louis Courier of Medicine in 1899. Although the explanation given then does not entirely harmonize with the present debated theories, the occurrence of a supersensibility and the clinical symptoms were clearly depicted.

"CONDITIONS OFTEN PROTRACTED.

"The condition is sometimes remarkably protracted. Thus, in one instance, in a little girl who received an injection of antidiphtheritic serum four years previously, another injection of the so-called globulin antitoxin produced violent symptoms in a few hours. Rosenan and Anderson found the condition persisting for several months. It is possible that this supersensitiveness may remain throughout life in certain individuals, and that it may be transmitted to offspring, as is the case in guinea pigs.

"The symptoms of this second reaction are very similar to those of the primary disease but supervene very soon after the second injection, sometimes within a few minutes. There may be a chill, convulsions, and sudden high fever. The respiration becomes very rapid, the pulse accelerated, and the patient shows great anxiety. In some cases a severe dermatitis, with local pain around the site of the injection, appears. Bolton reported a case of local gangrene.

"As far as I can learn no cases of death have occurred in human beings by the repeated injections of horse serum, yet the severe symptoms which sometimes occur and the fact that gangrene and death are so frequent in animals, convinces the clinician that antitoxic horse serum is by no means a remedy which can be used carelessly or indiscriminately.

"Another form of supersensitiveness occurs in certain individuals who have not had a previous injection of antitoxin. Quite a number of cases have been reported, and I have seen a number myself in which the immediate serum reaction occurred, and yet the patient injected had never before had a dose of horse serum. No explanation can be offered for these cases at present except that of idiosyncrasy.

"All efforts to rid the curative sera of the toxic substance which sensitizes have proved futile. Meule's observation that fresh sera have a greater tendency to cause rashes than older sera has been refuted experimentally by Rosenan. So far all theories offered to explain this condition have met all the known facts."

The mistakes the doctors make in diagnosing cases of supposed smallpox and other diseases would be ludicrous if they were not so serious in their consequences. Pasadena, Cal., had a conspicuous case of this kind. Dr. Stanley P. Black, health officer of that city, was called to pass upon the case of two children, pronounced their case smallpox, placarded the house, established a quarantine, and ordered over 300 children, who had not been successfully vaccinated, excluded from the schools. The indignant parents of the excluded children demanded that some other physician be called in to determine whether the sick children really had the smallpox. But the health officer, characteristic of his kind, refused to allow another doctor to see them. An indignation meeting of citizens was called and the doctor forced to allow another doctor to be called. The result was that the children were found to be suffering from poison oak. Then the health officer did the only sensible thing he had done in the whole transaction. He resigned.

I could go on quoting from opinions of doctors and scientists almost without number showing how useless vaccination is and the lives that have been sacrificed by the use of vaccine matter, but it would serve no useful purpose. The people will not think for themselves. They rely upon the doctors and vaccination is a rich source of revenue to them. They know no more about its effects than do other people, but the "faith in the doctor and his drugs and his remedies," according to Dr. Osler, is quite enough.

But there is one other thing to which I call the attention of the Senate. In the Public Health Reports of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, June 23, 1911, Asst. Surg. Gen. John W. Trask has this to say on the subject of the probable or possible effects of vaccination:

That the community is protected by vaccination may be true for certain localities, but that the protection thus afforded is general can hardly be maintained. Japan as a nation is probably as well or better protected by vaccination than is the United States, and yet in 1907–8 there was an outbreak of smallpox in Japan in which 19,101 cases were reported with 6,273 deaths. Vaccination did not there modify the type of the disease to that found in America. In that outbreak among 5,215 smallpox patients 1,527 were found who had never been vaccinated. This is interesting, as indicating a relatively small number of unvaccinated individuals. The epidemic was apparently one of considerable virulence, the general death rate per hundred being 42.25 among the cases in 1907 and 32.32 among those in 1908, while the deaths among the unvaccinated were 69.4 per hundred cases. Kitasato believes that the virulence of the disease varies, and that when it reaches the high point attained in Japan during 1907–8 individuals who have been previously vaccinated, and even those who have previously had an attack, contract the disease. In this outbreak there were 242 cases in seven prefectures in which the patients had previously had the disease. Of these, 57 died.

If the nonvirulence of the disease in this country is due to protection by vaccination it would be expected that the mild cases would be found only in those so protected. This may be assumed from the limited information available not to be the case. Records of the vaccination history of all patients would undoubtedly add much to our knowledge of the subject.

That the type of the disease as seen in the United States is due to the protective value of vaccination is shown not to be true for certain localities in which outbreaks of the virulent form of the disease have been reported. These outbreaks have occurred at widely separated points, extending from Virginia and South Carolina in 1909 to Michigan, Oklahoma, Texas, and Oregon in 1910. The cases of the disease reported in New York City in 1910 also had a high percentage of deaths. These outbreaks showed a high virulence, the deaths being at the rate of from 16.13 at Cleveland, Ohio, to 54.05 in Oklahoma County, Okla., per hundred cases.

This comes from an official medical source. It shows two things: (1) That the doctors do not know whether vaccination prevents smallpox or not, and (2) that experience tends to prove that it does not. This was a hard blow to the vaccination doctors.

But, Mr. President, although this report was printed less than a year ago, a copy of it, containing this statement, can not be had to-day. I understand that it has been reprinted with this portion of it suppressed. I suppose Dr. Trask was duly reprimanded for telling the truth in his report. I venture the assertion that he was not a member of the American Medical Association or he never would have fallen into the error of discrediting a practice that brings so much money to the profession. With all the claims made for vaccination, with a large part of the doctors its use never could have been maintained without compulsory laws; and no such laws could ever be passed without the aid of the doctors, and that aid would not be given if it were not such an economic source of revenue to the doctors. The law that compels its use is one of the worst laws that good citizens who believe in liberty have cause to complain of.

Mr. John Pitcairn has this to say on the subject in the Ladies' Home Journal for May, 1910:

Vaccination is the putting of an impure thing into the blood—a virus or poison—often resulting in serious evil effects. In vogue for more than 100 years, it has been received by most persons without question. But the time is passing when people will accept a medical dogma on blind faith; they now demand to know something about the practices to which they are called on to submit; and most insistent of all should be the demand to know something of a practice which, like vaccination, involves the risk of disease and of possible death.

* * * * * * *

But I need hardly appeal to statistics, which might be gathered from every civilized country. Consult any mother having practical acquaintance with the results of vaccination, as observed by herself, and you will rarely fail to hear something of its serious and lasting ill-effects.

Surely these facts and figures are enough to show that vaccination involves serious risks, and to make it incumbent upon all, and especially on parents, to make some inquiry at least before they submit either themselves or their children to these risks.

But some one may ask, if all this is true, why does vaccination continue? It continues, very largely, because it is enforced by law. Take away legal compulsion and vaccination would not long survive. But it has been enforced almost from its birth and has thus come to be regarded as more or less a matter of course. In all modern history no other medical operation has ever been legally enforced. But vaccination needed enforcement. Without compulsion it could never have survived, for from the very day of its introduction it has been strenuously opposed both by laymen and by members of the medical profession. Eminent physicians, it is true, have supported it, but equally eminent physicians, and also renowned bacteriologists and statisticians, have condemned it as productive of the gravest injuries.

With respect to the danger and uncertainty, generally, of these serum remedies the Journal of the American Medical Association of January, 1910, has this to say:

SERUM THERAPY IN A CONDITION OF CHAOS.

There is no class of remedial agents on which the physician should be better informed and none, unfortunately, concerning which it is so difficult to obtain a scientific and unbiased opinion. Only one of the drugs of this class—diphtheria antitoxin—is recognized by the present United States Pharmacopœia; and although some of the others (vaccine virus, for instance) have been in use for some time, all are the subject of such active investigation at the present time and so many new facts concerning them are being discovered that it is extremely difficult for a practitioner to keep abreast of these developments.

Scientific and disinterested information concerning them is widely scattered and often not easily accessible. The result has been that physicians have become dependent to an unusual degree on the circulars issued by manufacturing houses. Some of these circulars are almost models of scientific accuracy; others, unfortunately, are far from accurate and the directions given for the use of the products are not even safe.

And yet the National Government with all of its power is forcing their use upon its unwilling citizens.

Mr. President, I have now talked for something over two hours and a half. As it will probably take some little time to conclude what I have to say, most of it being a legal discussion, I shall be glad if the Senate will indulge me by adjourning, to allow me to complete what I have to say to-morrow after the conclusion of the morning business.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just let the Senator give notice that he will resume the floor at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow.

Mr. WORKS. Very well. I give notice, Mr. President, that to-morrow, immediately after the routine morning business, I will conclude what I have to say

COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to call up House bill 22043.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the Senator proceeds with that bill, to the consideration of which I will not object, I have two resolutions somewhat in the nature of privileged resolutions, which I ask to have considered. If the Senator will yield for that purpose, it will take but a moment.

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That one of the standing committees of the Senate be a Committee on National Banks, to consist of five Senators.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. BACON. Is not this committee under the classification prescribed in the rules?

Mr. GALLINGER. It was a committee of the Senate two years ago, but was dropped last year from the list.

Mr. BACON. It is then covered by the rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is covered by the rule.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That Mr. SANDERS be appointed chairman of the Committee on National Banks.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY ON OCEAN STEAMERS.

Mr. BOURNE, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 3815) to amend an act entitled "An act to require apparatus and operators for radiocommunication on certain ocean steamers," approved June 24, 1910, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 680) thereon.

AIDS TO NAVIGATION.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 22043) to authorize additional aids to navigation in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes. It is a bill that came over from the House, and the Senate committee has added to it sundry amendments. It is important that the bill should be passed in order to get it into conference as soon as possible.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 22043) to authorize additional aids to navigation in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

Mr. NELSON. I ask that the amendments of the committee be considered as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendments will be considered as they are reached.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 1, after line 8, to insert:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 29, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite and eternal Spirit, our heavenly Father, be with us to sustain and guide in every legitimate effort to better the conditions of mankind. Deliver us, we beseech Thee, from the holier than thou attitude, lest our usefulness be impaired in the social, political, and religious fields of endeavor. To minister not to be ministered to, to serve not to be served, to lend a hand where help is needed, that in all the relationships of life, private or public, we may follow the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Friday, April 26, 1912, was read and approved.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS—POLICE AND FIREMEN'S PENSIONS.

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to further consider the bill (H. R. 20840) to provide for deficiencies in the fund for police and firemen's pensions and relief in the District of Columbia, which is the unfinished business coming over from last District day.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20840, with Mr. OLDFIELD in the chair.

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, this bill is the unfinished business remaining over from the last District day. It is a bill to provide sufficient means to pay the pensions to the firemen and policemen which are now authorized by law. It does not in any respect whatever alter the existing pension law. It does not affect the method by which those pensions are provided, nor does it alter the amount of those pensions in any way whatever. It simply attempts to provide money from which they shall be paid. Under a law approved May 26, 1908, it was provided that within 30 days after the passage of that act, and every two years thereafter, persons on the pension rolls in the District of Columbia for disabilities incurred while in the service of the police department or the fire department of the District of Columbia shall undergo a medical examination, and as a result of such examination the commissioners shall determine whether the pensions being paid in each case shall continue in whole or in part.

Pursuant to that law the commissioners have so determined what the pensions shall be; but there is not money enough to pay them, with the result that 91 policemen, 111 widows, 51 children, and 1 mother on the police pension roll, and 48 firemen, 35 widows, and 4 mothers on the firemen's pension roll are receiving approximately but 60 per cent of the pension which has been legally allotted to them, for the reason that no funds exist from which the pensions can be paid. Congress has heretofore repeatedly attempted to meet this deficiency. It has from one source after another provided funds for this express purpose, but all these sources of supply have been partial and incomplete. The result has been that the fund has grown smaller, the pension demand has become larger, and the funds were last year and are this year insufficient. Last year there was a deficiency of about $15,000. This year a deficiency in excess of $20,000 is expected. The committee unanimously have approved this bill, which lays taxation upon the property in the District, subject to general taxation, sufficient to raise the amount necessary to meet these pensions. The amount thus to be raised by tax is estimated this year to be approximately $25,000. If it be assumed, as the auditor of the District in the report to the committee has assumed, at $30,000, then the net amount of the tax would be 8½ cents on $1,000, or 85 cents per annum upon a taxpayer assessed for $10,000. It is a trifling matter as a matter of tax. It is a very serious matter as regards these poor people, who are in need of funds which have been lawfully given to them. The placing of the tax upon the District property is without any contribution whatever from the United States. In that respect there is no change in the nature of the fund. Heretofore all of the moneys have come from the District government. Hereafter, should this bill become a law, they will likewise come from the District. There is no change in this respect whatever.

I was asked to lay before the House the question as to the legal status of this tax. When the amount has been determined by the commissioners, and when there is money in the Treasury to pay that amount, then the amount is a lawful claim; but if the amount is insufficient there exists no lawful claim on the part of these pensioners under which they can sue and recover. Consequently the obligation, so far as it exists, is one of honor. We have led these people in a lawful way to believe that they shall receive a certain amount, and it is an obligation of honor to provide that amount. The report that the committee has submitted with this bill is very complete. It gives the name of every pensioner, the amount of the pension, the cause of disability, and the history of the whole pension fund. The committee, having made a unanimous report, earnesly hope that this bill will be favorably considered by the House to-day.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the question of the granting of civil pensions or retirement pensions is so interesting at the present time that I am going to take the time of the House for a little while to trace the history of the so-called policemen's fund and the firemen's fund in the District of Columbia. The legislation upon the subject is rather chaotic. I doubt whether anyone could tell just what the law is without a great deal of examination, and I am not sure that they can tell after the examination.

The Metropolitan police was established by an act of Congress approved August 6, 1861. Section 26 of that act provided:

That all rewards, fees, proceeds of gifts, and emoluments that may be allowed by the board of police to be paid and given for extraordinary services of any member of the police force, and all moneys arising from the sale of unclaimed goods shall constitute the "policemen's fund," of which the board of police shall be the trustee and may invest as they shall see fit. And whenever any member of the police force, in the actual discharge of his duty, shall become bodily disabled his necessary expenses, on the certificate of a competent surgeon stating the manner, cause, and condition of the injury, and approved by the board of police, during the time of his disabling as aforesaid continues, may become a charge upon the said fund. But the board of police may discontinue said allowance for any satisfactory reason. (12 Stat. L., p. 325.)

It will be noticed that in this first act, which was the beginning of the police pension fund, the fund was to consist only of rewards for extraordinary services which might be given to the policemen, and the money arising from the sale of unclaimed goods, and that the only money that was to be paid was to be paid where a member of the police force in the actual discharge of his duty became bodily disabled, and he should receive pay only during the time the actual disability continued.

That was the act of August 6, 1861. By section 9 of the act of July 16, 1862, the prior act was amended so that, among other things, it was provided that in addition to the sums of money provided by gifts and sale of unclaimed goods to go into the policemen's fund that all fines imposed by the board of police upon members of the police force by way of discipline and collectible from pay or salary should be added to the sums otherwise provided for for the policemen's fund. The amount that was to be paid was still the same as in the original act.

That act was as follows:

That the board of police, for meritorious and extraordinary services rendered by any member of the police force in the due discharge of his duty, may permit any member of the police force to retain for his own benefit any reward or present tendered him therefor; and it shall be cause of removal from the Metropolitan police force for any member thereof to receive any such reward or present without notice thereof to the Board of Metropolitan Police. Upon receiving said notice the said board may either order the said member to retain the same, or shall dispose of it for the benefit of the policemen's fund. All fines imposed by the board of police upon members of the Metropolitan police force, by way of discipline, and collectible from pay or salary, and all rewards, fees, proceeds of gifts, and emoluments that may be paid and given for account of extraordinary services of any member of the Metropolitan police force (except when allowed to be retained by said member) shall be paid to the treasurer of the Board of Metropolitan Police, unless otherwise appropriated by the board of police. (12 Stat. L., p. 581.)

In the act of June 22, 1874, revising and consolidating the statutes relating to the District of Columbia—Revised Statutes relating to District of Columbia and post roads, page 42—the provisions in the acts of 1861 and 1862, relating to the policeman's fund, were carried in sections 359, 361, 362, 363, and 364 of the revision, as follows:

SEC. 359. Upon notice to the board of police from any member of the police force of the receipt by such member of any reward or present, the board may order the member to retain the same or shall dispose thereof for the benefit of the policeman's fund.

SEC. 361. All fines imposed by the board of police upon members of the police force, by way of discipline, and collectible from pay or salary, and all rewards, fees, proceeds of gifts, and emoluments that may be paid and give for extraordinary services of any member of the police force, except when allowed to be retained by such member, shall be paid to the treasurer of the board of police, unless otherwise appropriated by the board.

SEC. 362. The rewards, fees, proceeds of gifts, and emoluments mentioned in the preceding section and all moneys arising from the sale of unclaimed goods shall constitute the "policeman's fund."

SEC. 363. The board of police shall be the trustee of the policeman's fund, and may invest the same as they shall see fit.

SEC. 364. Whenever any member of the police force, in the actual discharge of his duty, shall become actually disabled, his necessary expenses, during the time of such disability, on the certificate of a competent surgeon stating the manner, cause, and condition of the injury and approved by the board of police, may become a charge upon the policeman's fund. But the board may discontinue such allowance for any satisfactory reason.

That was the third act upon the subject. That act remained the law until 1885, and by the act of February 25, 1885, it was provided as follows:

Provided, That hereafter the commissioners shall deduct $1 each month from the pay of each policeman, which sum so deducted shall be added to and form a part of the present police fund, to be invested in United States or District bonds by the Treasurer of the United States, and be held by him subject to the drafts of the commissioners for expenditures made in pursuance of law, and such expenditures shall be accounted for as required by law for other expenditures of the District; and said police fund shall be used for the relief of any policeman who, by injury received or disease contracted in line of duty, or having served not less than 15 years, shall become so permanently disabled as to be discharged from service therefor; and in case of his death from such injury or disease, leaving a widow or children under 16 years, for their relief: Provided further, That such relief shall not exceed for any one policeman or his family the sum of $50 per month; and a sum not exceeding $75 may be allowed from said fund to defray the funeral expenses of any policeman dying in the service of the District.

Provided, That hereafter the commissioners shall deduct $1 each month from the pay of each fireman, which sum so deducted shall be kept as a firemen's relief fund, and be invested in United States or District bonds and held in manner provided in this act for the police fund, and shall be used for the relief of any fireman who, by injury received or disease contracted in line of duty, or having not served less than 15 years, shall become so permanently disabled as to be discharged from service therefor; and in case of his death from such injury or disease, leaving a widow or children under 16 years of age, for their relief: Provided further, That such relief shall not exceed for any one fireman or his family the sum of $50 per month; and a sum not exceeding $75 may be allowed from said fund to defray the funeral expenses of any fireman dying in the service of the District. (23 Stat. L., 316, 317.)

It will be noticed that the first two acts only proposed to pay for bodily injuries actually incurred in line of duty while those bodily injuries continued, and should only be paid out of the fund arising from gifts or sale of unclaimed goods or fines imposed upon members of the police force, but the fund not being sufficient, by the act of 1885 there was a deduction of $1 per month from salaries of policemen and firemen. Another act was passed June 11, 1896, again enlarging the fund by providing:

That hereafter the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, out of receipts from fines in the police court, a sufficient amount to meet any deficiency in the police or the firemen's relief fund.

And it was provided as follows:

Provided, That hereafter the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall deduct $1 per month from the pay of any fireman, which sum so deducted shall be kept as a firemen's relief fund and be invested in United States or District bonds, and held in the manner provided by existing law in respect to the policemen's fund, and shall be used for the relief of any fireman who, having served not less than 12 months, shall by reason of injuries received or disease contracted in the line of actual fire duty, going to, at, or returning from a fire, or having served not less than 15 years shall become so permanently disabled as to be discharged from service therefor; and in the case of the death of such fireman from such injury or disease, leaving a widow or children under 16 years of age, for their relief: Provided, That no fireman shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this relief fund who may by reason of his own indiscretion bring on any injury or disease which may incapacitate him from the performance of his duties as a member of the fire department or who shall be retired for such cause or causes: Provided further, That such relief shall not exceed, for any one fireman or his family, the sum of $50 per month; and a sum not exceeding $75 may be allowed from such fund to defray the funeral expenses of any fireman dying in the service of the District. (29 Stat. L., 404, 405.)

Mr. Chairman, I am aware that this is not a very interesting subject, and yet in view of the agitation concerning a retirement fund or a civil pension list it is interesting to know how these matters go if they are not carefully guarded in the original legislation. This act of 1896 again extended the persons who might receive from the pension fund, limiting it in case of firemen to those who had served not less than 12 months, but providing in addition that those who were discharged because of permanent disability after 15 years of service might receive money out of that fund, with the limitation that such relief shall not exceed to any one fireman or his family the sum of $50 per month.

We had now up to this time provided, first, that there should go into this fund the amount received from gifts, the amount received from unclaimed goods; second, the amount of fines levied upon members of the force; then, by another act, $1 per month of deduction from salaries; then, by another act, the deficiency could be paid out of the police court fines; and then comes the act of February 28, 1901, adding to these funds.

SEC. 4. That hereafter the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, out of receipts from fines in the police court and receipts from dog licenses, a sufficient amount to meet any deficiency in the policemen's fund or firemen's fund: Provided, That the chief engineer of the fire department and the superintendent, assistant superintendent, any captain or lieutenant of police, in case of retirement as now provided by law, shall receive relief not exceeding $100 per month; and in case of the death from injury or disease of any of the officers named in this section, if he leave a widow or children under 16 years of age, the same shall be for their relief during the period of widowhood or until such children reach the age of 16 years: Provided, That in no case shall the amount paid to a widow exceed $50 per month nor shall the amount paid for a child exceed $25 per month. (31 Stat. L., p. 820.)

This act of 1901, which added dog licenses on one side in the way of receipts added to the expenditures on the other side by providing that the chief engineer of the fire department and the superintendent, assistant superintendent, any captain or lieutenant of police, in case of retirement as now provided by law, shall receive a pension of not exceeding $100 per month; and in case of injury or disease of any officer named in this section, if he leaves a widow or child under 16 years of age, the widow might receive $50 per month and each child $25 per month. This act was afterwards amended by the act of February 27, 1907, to include among those who might receive $100 per month "inspectors" of police. And by the act of March 3, 1901, it was provided:

The provisions contained in the act of Congress approved June 11, 1896, relating to the firemen's relief fund, may, within the discretion of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, be extended to and used for the relief of any fireman or his family, although he may not heretofore, or hereafter, have served 12 months. (31 Stat. L., p. 1020.)

When the first extension was made the fireman must have served 12 months, and somebody had a case and we passed an act providing that a fireman might receive a pension regardless of length of service. By the act of March 1, 1905, which repeated in language acts already upon the statute books, without reference to them, there was added to the beneficiaries dependent mothers. By the act of March 31, 1906, this addition of dependent mothers among the beneficiaries was made to include mothers of those who died previous to the original act taking effect.

By the act of March 9, 1908, the act of March 1, 1905, was amended by extending its provisions to cover that the chief engineer of the fire department and all other officers of such department of and above the rank of captain, and any chief engineer of the fire department and all other officers of such department of and above the rank of captain already retired and receiving a pension in pursuance of the law prior to the approval of the act of March 1, 1905. These last three acts were as follows:

Act of March 1, 1905:

SEC. 4. That hereafter the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, out of receipts from fines in the police court and receipts from dog licenses, a sufficient amount to meet any deficiency in the policemen's fund or firemen's fund: Provided, That the chief engineer of the fire department and all other officers of said department of and above the rank of captain, the superintendent, assistant superintendent, any captain, or lieutenant of police, in case of retirement as now provided by law, shall receive relief not exceeding $100 per month; and in case of the death from injury or disease of any member of the police or fire department, if he be unmarried and leave a dependent mother, who is a widow, the same shall be for her relief during the period of widowhood, or if he leave a widow, or children under 16 years of age, the same shall be for their relief during the period of widowhood, or until such children reach the age of 16 years: Provided, That in no case shall the amount paid to such dependent mother or widow exceed $50 per month, nor shall the amount paid for a child exceed $25 per month. (33 Stat. L., p. 821.)

Act of March 31, 1906:

That from and after the passage of this act the provision of the act act approved March 1, 1905, entitled "An act to amend section 4 of an act entitled 'An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia,' approved February 28, 1901," for the relief during widowhood of dependent mothers of unmarried deceased members of said Metropolitan police force and of unmarried deceased members of the fire department of said District shall include such mothers of any such deceased members of said police force and of said fire department who have died from injury or disease prior to March 1, 1905. (34 Stat. L., p. 95.)

Act of March 9, 1908:

That the act of Congress approved March 1, 1905, entitled "An act to amend section 4 of an act entitled 'An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia,' " is hereby amended by extending its provisions in behalf of the chief engineer of the fire department, and all other officers of said department of and above the rank of captain, to any chief engineer of the fire department and all other officers of said department of and above the rank of foreman, who were retired and pensioned in pursuance of law prior to the approval of said act: Provided, That when retired the present chief engineer of the fire department of the District of Columbia shall receive as retired pay a sum equal to one-half of the salary allowed by law at date of retirement.

By the act of May 26, 1908, medical examinations were provided of those on the pension rolls, with authority to change the pension to be paid.

That act is as follows:

Provided further, That within 30 days after the passage of this act and every two years thereafter persons on the pension rolls in the District of Columbia, for disabilities incurred while in the service of the police department or fire department of the District of Columbia, shall undergo a medical examination; the commissioners shall determine whether the pension being paid in each case shall continue in whole or in part. (35 Stat. L., p. 296.)

By the act of March 4, 1909, some old deficiencies were ordered to be paid out of the fund.

That act is as follows:

That the amount withheld from pensioners of the police fund on account of deficiencies in said fund during the period from June 1, 1894, to May 31, 1896, is authorized to be paid, and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to adjust and settle all claims for said deficiencies in the payment of allowances made by them to pensioners of said police fund. In case of death of any beneficiary under the provisions of this bill the amount due such beneficiary shall be paid to the legal representative thereof. (35 Stat. L., 1066.)

By the act of March 9, 1908, it was provided that when retired the person then chief engineer in the fire department should receive as retired pay a sum equal to one-half of the salary allowed by law at the date of retirement.

Gradually the various moneys which might go into the fund were increased and the various sources from which moneys might come were increased. Gradually the beneficiaries were increased, with no provision in the law anywhere as to the amount which should be paid to any beneficiary except the limitation originally made that any person should not be paid over $50 per month, afterwards raised to $100 a month for the officers. Every time a new step was taken a subsequent act was passed extending all of its benefits to anyone who would have been subject to it if that law had been passed in the first instance.

It is no wonder that the fund is now short. It is true that by the act of May 26, 1908, it was provided that the District every two years might have a medical examination made of those who were upon the pension rolls and might change the amount of pension or strike the pensions off altogether. Whether that has been done in many cases I can not say. I think many of the Members are familiar with the case of Sidney Bieber, who served a short time in the fire department and was retired on a pension of $90 per month, and his name was afterwards stricken from the roll. The original purpose to provide a pension fund out of which should be paid those who were actually disabled in the service, to be raised by contribution which came from the members of the force itself, has disappeared, and there is now devoted to the purpose of paying pensions all gifts, proceeds of sales of unclaimed property, all fines levied upon the members of the force, all the police-court fines, and all the dog licenses collected.

And now comes the proposition which, without in any way determining the amount which shall be paid to the policeman or the fireman—and the amount which is paid is in many cases excessive—proposes to provide that all the money that is necessary shall be raised by taxation, with no limitation on the amount which may be paid.

The police-pension fund now has upon its rolls 90 retired policemen, 112 widows, 1 mother, and 51 children, or had at the time the report on this bill was made, with a total monthly pay roll of $7,538. Of this large number, 4 have been retired for age, 4 have been retired because injured in line of duty, 2 have been retired because injured in action, 1 has been retired for rupture from injury—where I can not say. One has been retired permanently on account of typhoid fever. The other causes for retirement are the ordinary causes which would occur to men whether in the police department or the fire department or in the clerical service of the Government not connected in any way whatever with disability incurred in the service by reason of the service. Anyone in the police or fire departments to-day, after 15 years of service, is subject to be retired by the commissioners for any cause which they choose to say constitutes permanent disability. And there are many persons upon the retired list in this city, in both branches of the service, fully capable and competent of rendering service in those departments, and still more capable and competent of rendering service in ordinary civil life where the work may not be so strenuous at times as it is in the police and fire departments.

There was no control by legislation or law in regard to the amount which may be paid except the limitation on ordinary police and firemen of not to exceed $50 a month and of the officers not to exceed $100 per month.

Now, a proposition without in any way grading those who are to be retired or pensioned, without in any way determining that the cause of retirement shall be connected with the service which they have rendered, is made to raise a sufficient fund out of taxation, with no restriction as to paying all the money which may be necessary to pay for the retirement of anyone whom the commissioners may choose to retire hereafter. A man may not have been in the service two days, and yet he may be placed on the retired list for life. He may not have served more than 15 years and he may be retired, regardless of the cause of disability.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to know if the gentleman is aware of any precedents in States for this kind of legislation? That is to say, a general tax on all the property of the State or city to pay for police or firemen's pensions?

Mr. MANN. I am not aware—I do not know whether that exists or not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not find anything in the report about it. I think it would be interesting to know whether there are any precedents for this legislation.

Mr. REDFIELD. I can not hear what the gentleman says.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I was inquiring of the gentleman from Illinois whether he knows of any direct precedents for this legislation.

Mr. REDFIELD. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yield so that I may answer the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. REDFIELD. If the gentleman will refer to the act approved March 4, 1909, he will find the following:

That the amount withheld from pensioners of the police fund on account of deficiencies in said fund during the period from June 1, 1894, to May 31, 1896, is authorized to be paid, and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to adjust and settle all claims for said deficiencies in the payment of allowances made by them to pensioners of the said police fund.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I beg the gentleman's pardon; that was not the question I asked.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, that act of 1909, to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] has referred, and a copy of which I hold in my hand, did not make any appropriation for the payment of these deficiencies. It only authorized the commissioners, where the full amount which they had awarded to the pensioners had not been paid to them from June 1, 1894, to May 31, 1896, to pay those deficiencies, and the only way they could pay them would be to pay them out of these funds.

It was a grab act which somebody managed to get through Congress to pay sale claims, arising between 1894 and 1896, out of these funds. It is one of the reasons why the funds were depleted. If a person had died it was to be paid to his legal representatives.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman from Illinois will pardon me, the question I asked was whether there were precedents in States for this legislation. That is to say, whether there is a general tax upon the grand duplicate of a county or city to pay policemen's or firemen's pensions.

Mr. REDFIELD. There are precedents.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can the gentleman state them?

Mr. REDFIELD. I can not fully; but they appear to a greater or less extent in the report of the hearing on H. R. 22322, House Committee on the District of Columbia, Sixtieth Congress, second session, 1910, which gives the precedents of 20 leading American cities in handling those funds.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I did not know of any where there is a general tax levied on the property of all the city or county.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not mean a general tax, but he means a special tax?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; I mean a special tax on all the property.

Mr. MANN. I am inclined to think that this is a departure, but I do not wish to take issue with the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] on the proposition as to whether if the money is to be paid it shall be paid out of a special tax levied or a general tax levied in the District of Columbia. To me it is six of one and half a dozen of the other, except if a special tax is levied it brings home to the taxpayers of the District the fact that they are paying a special tax for pension funds to policemen and firemen on the retired list, and it is possible, though not probable, that that will affect somewhat in the future the extension of the beneficiaries, because it is not to be assumed that after these many acts, 12 or 13 in number, affecting policemen's and firemen's funds, each of which has extended those instruments which are to be taxed to raise the funds, and has extended the beneficiaries who are to receive it—it is not to be expected, when we provide ad libitum the money to pay for them, that the number of beneficiaries will not hereafter be enlarged.

Mr. LOBECK. I wish to state, if I may, that in the city of Omaha out of the general appropriation made for the policemen's fund the unexpended balance of what is not used for policemen's services is put into the pension fund under the law. Also in the teachers' pension fund the school board has the right to levy on the assessed property a mill tax to make up their pensions. So that we have a precedent in my city at least.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have not called the attention of the House to the legislation on this subject with any idea that a bill which proposes to raise money to pay these beneficiaries will not pass, but for the purpose of calling the attention of Members of the House to the growth of these pension propositions.

We have had for years before us a school-teachers' pension bill which on its face, as I have at various times stated to the House, does not purport to raise money enough to pay the pensions, but they have come in with those bills declaring that they have made ample provision for the raising of the money, hoping to get Congress, in the case of the school-teachers' fund and other funds, in the same position that it is in concerning the policemen's and firemen's funds. They say to us, "You authorized that these beneficiaries should be granted this money under the law. Now it is your business to raise the money to pay them. You gave the commissioners authority to put those people on the pension rolls, and it is your duty, having done that, to provide the money," although when we did so by law we did it with the express provision that those beneficiaries should only be paid out of the funds that we thereby provided, and it was the duty, and it is the duty of the commissioners in making up their pension rolls, to provide only pensions enough to absorb the money that is raised. They have no right, legal or moral, and have had no right in the past, knowing the funds that they had, to go ahead and provide payments much in excess of the fund which had been raised; in other words, to allow people large pensions when they knew that the moneys we had provided for were not sufficient to pay the pensions. And they knew that, knowing human nature, knowing legislators, knowing that they have played a confidence game on Congress; and then they come to us, after we have said that out of certain moneys you can pay certain funds, and say, "You have authorized the payments out of this fund. Now you must provide the additional money with which to pay them."

It is a fraud upon the legislative body. The school-teachers' pension bill, which has been pending, is a pure confidence game on Congress. There is nobody familiar with it but knows that they can not pay the pensions provided for in that bill out of the funds which are set apart for that purpose. But when the pension roll is made up they say, "You promised to pay the pensions. Now you must furnish the wherewith."

The same is true of all these civil pension retirement funds that have been proposed. We have had bills reported in the House in the past providing for retirement funds or civil pensions, and in no one of them is there enough money provided to pay pensions for the retirements which are allowed.

I am not opposed myself, Mr. Chairman, to the creation of a civil pension list. I believe it is inevitable that a civil pension list will come. I believe it is not only inevitable, but that it may be quite proper to pay pensions to those who are injured in the service, or who through long years of service have reached an age or a physical condition where they are unable to continue in the service. But when we pass bills providing for pension lists we ought to figure on what they will cost, and we ought to know where the funds are coming from with which to pay them.

Here is this policemen's fund, which has had added to it sources of revenue of different kinds five or six times. Originally they said, "Oh, all we want to do is to take the rewards that are voluntarily given to us and divide them among those of us who are disabled." Then they added to that, "Well, if we are fined as a matter of discipline, we would like to put that money into the fund," and that was allowed. Then they said, "We are active in obtaining fines in the police court. We ought to have the police-court fines to go into that fund," and we allowed it. Then they said, "We chase the dogs and see that they have licenses. We ought to have the dog licenses to go into that fund," and we allowed it. Every time we allowed one of those additions to the fund they added to the beneficiaries of the fund and in most instances increased the amount, all the time knowing the funds were not sufficient, as provided by any of the legislation, to meet the expense, although we were told when the bills passed that no more money could be paid out than we had provided to be paid in. Now we propose to put a blanket over the whole thing and let them pay all they want to, practically regardless of term of service, because it is the District of Columbia. I do not know whether we will ever do that with all of the employees of the Government whom we pay out of the general fund of the Treasury, but at least it has not been done yet. We are very free to put a blanket mortgage in the way of a special tax on the property of the District of Columbia only to take care of the beneficiaries without any regard whatever to those who pay the taxes.

Mr. BUCHANAN and Mr. SLAYDEN rose.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to his colleague from Illinois?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield to me——

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the gentleman whether these special taxes on real estate in the District of Columbia and other sources of revenue——

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I understand that the rule of the House requires that gentlemen who desire to interrupt shall address the Chair.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Texas did address the Chair, and I gave him leave.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, in 15 years of service in this House——

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman from Texas was not recognized by the Chair and I was.

Mr. MANN. He did not have to be. I gave him leave myself.

Mr. SLAYDEN. In reply to the criticism of the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MANN. Which is entirely unwarranted.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I ask a decision of my point of order, and not a reply from the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman will get it, anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yield?

Mr. MANN. I stated before that I yielded to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the gentleman will permit me just a moment, I want to say that in 15 years' service here I have never interrupted any gentleman on the floor of the House without conforming to the rule and without addressing the Chair and asking permission. I hope the gentleman himself will be as scrupulous in observing the courtesies of this House.

Now, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether these sources of revenue for this pension fund that he speaks of will be adequate to meet it, and whether if they are not adequate the Treasury of the United States will not have to contribute to it, and whether, in point of fact, we will not have to contribute out of the Federal Treasury to keep the government of the District of Columbia going, anyway.

Mr. MANN. The sources of revenue contemplated by this bill are certainly sufficient to meet any deficiency, because this bill provides that, no matter what the deficiency may be, there shall be a special tax levied against all the property in the District of Columbia, in addition to the taxes now provided by law; but, of course, in the end we will be met with this proposition, that under the organic act, so called, we have agreed to pay as much for the benefit of the District as the District raises by taxation; and, of course, in the end we will have to pay our half of the deficiency. But this bill does not provide for that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is precisely what my understanding of the situation was.

Mr. MANN. Now I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask my colleague, as a matter of information, whether he knows the provision for police pensions in Chicago and how the funds are raised there. My colleague probably knows.

Mr. MANN. I will say to my colleague that I have been over that matter quite thoroughly. I do not care to take it up and discuss it at this time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Very well. I will withdraw the question.

Mr. MANN. I had the matter up in connection with the teachers' pension fund.

Mr. BUCHANAN. To-day?

Mr. MANN. No; not to-day.

Mr. BUTLER. Here is the provision——

Mr. MANN. I understand that. I have been over this, and I have not only read the law, but I have read the regulations concerning that, governing the trustees who have charge of the fund in Chicago. There is no place in the Union where, without a blanket provision, they raise money enough to pay the pensions that are authorized, unless there is a close limitation on the pensions which can be paid. Then in no case does it last very long, unless there is an absolute limitation that the pensions shall not exceed the amount which is paid in.

Mr. GARRETT rose.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman to give a construction of the organic act in effect that the Federal Government was pledged to pay out of the Treasury an amount equal to the amount raised by taxation in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN. I did not express any opinion upon the subject. I said, of course, it is claimed that under the organic act the Federal Treasury must meet as much as is raised by taxation in the District, and in the end, in my judgment, that view will prevail in this case, as I think in ordinary cases it ought to prevail; possibly not in every case.

Mr. GARRETT. Of course, the question is whether or not the Federal Government is pledged to expend as much money as is raised by taxation, or whether it is pledged simply to expend an amount equal to the amount appropriated out of the District revenues.

Mr. MANN. I know, but if we raise it by taxation it has got to be spent in some way. Nobody proposes to raise money in the District of Columbia by taxation and let it remain forever in the Treasury. It must be expended in some way.

I have no doubt that if this bill becomes a law the chances are that it will provide that it will be half and half, although that is not what the bill says, and I do not think that is what the gentleman in charge of the bill desires. We all know what a furore there has been respecting the provision about playgrounds, that the money shall be paid wholly out of the funds of the District.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, did I correctly understand the gentleman a few minutes ago to say that retirement and pension is discretionary with the Commissioners, without regard to disability or length of service?

Mr. MANN. No; the gentleman did not understand me correctly. At the end of 15 years they can be retired for permanent disability. Any time before that they can be retired for actual disability incurred in service without any regard to the length of service. At the end of 15 years they can be retired for permanent disability and the list of retirements shows that the words "permanent disability" as applied to these people on the retired list are words of very wide latitude of construction, and no one who knows the facts will claim that anything like all of these persons on the retired list are in fact disabled from earning a living by manual labor.

Mr. Chairman, we have had a good deal of talk in Congress with reference to pensions for Civil War veterans, and there has been a great deal of criticism on account of the large pensions which we propose to allow by a pending measure. In the case of the firemen in the District of Columbia the average pension has increased so that it is now $48.96 a month. One pensioner receives $100 per month; two $75 per month each; four $65 per month each; and one $60. In the police department the average pension paid was $34.96, but is now $29.68, although that includes some as low as $2 per month. A pension is paid at $90 and at $75—very large pensions as compared with the proposed increase of Civil War pensions; a number of times as great as you propose to pay the Civil War pensioner who served three years in the Army or who has reached the age of 75 years. These people are not required to be so disabled as to need help. If they are merely permanently disabled from serving as policemen or firemen upon any excuse they go upon this retired list, with a blanket mortgage upon all of the property in the District of Columbia with which to raise the funds, and with no limitation or control by act of Congress or otherwise over the amount which shall be paid to any one individual. If we should follow the same course with reference to civil employees of the Government generally the pension fund of the Government would amount to more than a hundred millions of dollars a year. It seemed to me, Mr. Chairman, fair at this time to call the attention of the House to the history of this legislation, which I was not able to get at any place complete, without going through the statutes myself, in view of the propositions that are constantly coming up concerning civil pensions, hoping that before we proceed further we would provide definitely what we intend for the future. I think in this case the Committee on the District of Columbia, if it had desired to raise the deficiencies on these pensions ought to have brought in a bill closely defining and describing those who should be pensioned, and the rates at which they should be pensioned, under some such system as prevails in all other countries in the world where pensions are granted—not merely granting the same pensions to everyone without any relation to the cause of the pensions. [Applause.]

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that general debate shall cease in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I object for the present. I may want to speak on this matter myself a little later.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from New York a question. Does this bill carry an appropriation to pay retired firemen?

Mr. REDFIELD. No.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Retired policemen?

Mr. REDFIELD. No.

Mr. TRIBBLE. What does the bill provide?

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the bill provides for laying a tax on all the property in the District, the amount of which tax shall be sufficient to pay the deficiency in the fund already authorized by law.

Mr. TRIBBLE. What amount? What is the highest amount of one of those pensions?

Mr. REDFIELD. They are fixed by law at a maximum of $50, except in the case of officers. The report gives the whole matter in detail.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Was the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] correct, that there will be some on this roll who would draw $75 a month?

Mr. REDFIELD. There are some of the disabled officers who draw that amount.

Mr. TRIBBLE. What officers?

Mr. REDFIELD. Officers of the fire department.

Mr. TRIBBLE. What is their age?

Mr. REDFIELD. I do not know. The report gives every pensioner in detail. If the gentleman, instead of taking the time of the House, will be kind enough to look at the report, which sets out every pensioner——

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I have a perfect right to call the attention of the House to the fact by stating it before the House, by questioning you, if I see fit, without looking in the book to see.

Mr. REDFIELD. Unquestionably.

Mr. TRIBBLE. The gentleman is calling on us to pay $75 a month to certain pensioners on that roll who served in the fire department?

Mr. REDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. TRIBBLE. And the gentleman is unable to give us any information as to whether these men are injured or any information as to the age of these men?

Mr. GARRETT. Why not let the gentleman from New York make his general statement?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Very well, I shall withdraw the question and see what information he will give about it. I am opposed to the bill, and I desire to bring out facts that will cause other Members to investigate before casting their votes to sustain the committee report.

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the laws under which the pensions of the firemen and policemen of the District of Columbia are paid are not in any way whatever affected by this bill, either up or down. The list of pensioners complete appears in the report. There is no question whatever raised, and none has been raised, that the pensions existing are in accordance with law, nor does this bill affect the amount of those pensions in any way, shape, or manner.

But I will go on and deal a little, if I may, with the facts that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has stated. The fact is that the average amount of pensions in the larger fund is decreasing and not increasing. It has fallen off in four years from an average amount of $34.90 to an average of $29.68. There are many of these pensions which are very small, $2, $3, $4, $5, and $6 a month, and so on. The term of service prior to retirement is increasing and not decreasing. The longest service before retirement is now 47 years, instead of 43 years, as four years ago. The entire increase in the fund for policemen from all causes has been $600 per annum in four years.

The entire increase in the fund from all causes in the firemen's fund has been $800 in four years. The law strictly requires that every second year every pensioner shall pass a medical examination, and failing to pass that examination his pension may be cut off, and, in fact, on the 29th day of July, 1908, four were discontinued entirely. Furthermore, the act provides that as a result of that examination the commissioners shall determine whether the pension being paid shall continue in whole or part, and as a matter of fact they are very commonly reduced. I have in my hand a list of 11 cases of pensions that were reduced by the commissioners on the 29th of July, 1908, and on the 30th day of June, 1910, there was another examination in which four further pensions were reduced. In one particular case the pension has been cut off from $90 to $1. In other words, the right of review exists and is exercised by the commissioners very carefully, and again within the next two months a further review will take place, as authorized by law. So that the facts are that not only is the largest amount of these pensions fixed by law heretofore passed by Congress, but, as a matter of fact, the reviewing body every two years passes upon the pensions and reduces a great many more of them than it increases.

So that the rolls seem to be very carefully guarded, more carefully guarded than any other roll that has come to my knowledge, and, as a result, on the police force the average pension is getting smaller every year and the term of service before retirement is getting longer. The fact, however, is that even with these reductions already existing there is not money enough to pay them, and the police fund beneficiaries, consisting chiefly of widows and children, are receiving about 60 per cent of that which has been allotted to them by the commissioners.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. REDFIELD. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. As the gentleman refers to the act of 1908 he refers to medical examination and change in the amount of pension. I call his attention to the fact that few pensions have been decreased. These pensions, as I understand it, have been decreased at the time when there was a threat that the amount of money in the pension fund would not be sufficient to pay the full pension. Is not that a fact?

Mr. REDFIELD. I think not.

Mr. MANN. Has not that threat been hanging over them since 1908—that there was not money enough to pay the full pensions?

Mr. REDFIELD. I think not. I think the fund up to year before last was sufficient in view of the last action of Congress. The reasons for the reduction of each of these pensions are given in the report of the secretary of the commissioners, which I hold in my hand, and in every case they were in accordance with the circumstances that developed. For instance, the pension of $40 a month which is paid to R. S. Haynes was reduced to $20 a month, he being, in the opinion of the police and fire surgeons, not more than one-half disabled for the performance of manual labor.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that the Burkett report in the Senate, which is one of the most complete analyses of these funds we have, a few years ago called attention to the fact that the pension funds must run short, and thereupon legislation was enacted about that time providing for this reduction, and the reductions have been made in view not only of the possibility, but probability of a shortage in the fund?

Mr. REDFIELD. The Burkett report said that the receipts from the dog tax and police-court funds were likely to be smaller rather than larger and there would probably be in the future a shortage in that fund.

Mr. MANN. Now, does the gentleman think that with a law that raises all the money that is necessary in any fund there is any likelihood of there being any reduction?

Mr. REDFIELD. The gentleman's statement, if he will pardon me, is not quite complete. The law limits, as it has limited for years, the maximum pension. The maximum pension is so rarely paid that the average is about half of what is permitted. The average, if you take into account the officers' pensions, is less than half of what the law permits. Furthermore, the record shows that the board of review, comprising the commissioners, has exercised and does exercise usually its power to reduce and not to increase. Therefore it seems to me a perfectly sound business proposition to say if the law limits the maximum and provides a board, which by its practice has never used the maximum on the average, but exercises its power to reduce and in some cases to cancel, and when, despite those facts, which are lawful facts and provided for by law, women and children are not getting that which the law provides for them, I think it is an obligation of honor to pay. Nor do I think there is any reason which makes it look for a moment possible that this fund can be utilized in the future in a way in which it has certainly not been utilized in the past.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says that pensions which have been allowed have only been for half what might have been allowed. That pensions which should be allowed have been allowed out of funds temporarily insufficient to pay and only one-half of it has been allowed. Does not the gentleman think when it is arranged so that when these pensions can be allowed from an unlimited fund that the full amount will be allowed in every case?

Mr. REDFIELD. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I will repeat it to the gentleman. The gentleman stated that only about one-half the amount which should be allowed has been allowed under these pension funds, it being admitted that the pension fund is insufficient to pay the amount which should be allowed. Does the gentleman doubt that when there is an unlimited fund out of which these pensions can be paid that practically the full amount will be granted, and instead of one-half now allowed, which is out of a limited fund, is it not the universal experience that when there is an unlimited fund out of which amounts can be paid salaries or pensions the tendency is to allow the full amount which can be paid instead of cutting it short, as is the case where there is a limited fund out of which they can be paid?

Mr. HAMILL. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I merely want to ask this question: Has the gentleman any objection to having the full amount allowed by law providing it is just that the full amount be paid?

Mr. MANN. Of course, Mr. Chairman, no one has any objection to the payment of any sum to anybody which is just to be paid.

Mr. HAMILL. Then the gentleman is not at all objecting to the payment of the full sum, but merely states that perhaps in certain cases it might be paid unjustly?

Mr. MANN. I think my distinguished friend has not been here to hear my talk of about an hour, and I do not wish to repeat it.

Mr. HAMILL. I heard a great deal of what the gentleman said, and enough, I think, on which to base the question which I put. I hope so.

Mr. MANN. I hope I gave that in my remarks. The question is a perfectly fair question. I do not desire to detain the House with a long discussion.

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I renew my request for unanimous consent that debate on this bill be closed in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] asks unanimous consent that debate on this bill be closed in 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I do not quite understand what the difficulty is in the mind of my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in repeating again and again, as regards this bill, the word "unlimited." If I am limited to an income of $50 a month, I do not regard my income as unlimited. If a pension is fixed by law at $50 a month, I do not think it is an unlimited pension.

Mr. MANN. Well, if the gentleman will permit, what I said was an unlimited fund out of which pensions might be paid. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. REDFIELD. If the pensions be themselves limited and the fund be sufficient to provide only for limited pensions, it can not be an unlimited fund. A fund which can provide for that which is limited can not be unlimited. Here are laws which provide pensions. Here is experience which shows that those laws are not utilized to the full even when there be sufficient funds.

There have been times in the past when these funds have been sufficient, but at those times the pensions were not raised. As a matter of fact, the history of the whole fund is that the board of commissioners examined these pensioners with care, as required by law to do, and on the whole reduced or canceled the pensions, and that without regard to the question whether there were funds sufficient to pay them or not. If we may judge by experience, therefore, that a pension system having strictly limited pensions and with a board of revision which shall revise downward, which is a new experience, I grant to my friend on the other side—if we may judge by experience, therefore, I think it is a sound and businesslike procedure, without changing the law or altering the powers of the board, which has used its powers wisely to provide sufficient funds as a matter of honor to pay these pensioners who now fail to receive that which Congress has allotted to them.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REDFIELD. With pleasure.

Mr. WILLIS. I want to ask a question purely for information. I note here, on page 5 of the report, the statement of the pay roll of the fire department pensioners. Taking the case of those who appear here, I find one is receiving a pension of $30 a month, the next one $40, the next one $45, the next $55, and the next $75. How is the rate of pensions determined under the existing law? The gentleman is familiar with that, no doubt.

Mr. REDFIELD. The act of the commissioners under the special statute instructing them so to do, and in accordance——

Mr. WILLIS. There is no fixed rate?

Mr. REDFIELD. There is a maximum rate fixed.

Mr. WILLIS. And what is that maximum rate?

Mr. REDFIELD. The maximum rate appears——

Mr. WILLIS. The maximum rate here, I see, is $75.

Mr. REDFIELD. The maximum rate may be, in the case of a certain few officers, such as chief engineer of the fire department and superintendent or assistant superintendent or a captain or lieutenant of police, not to exceed $100 per month.

Mr. WILLIS. In no case exceeding $100 per month?

Mr. MANN. The pension for the widow is $50 a month, notwithstanding the $75 shown in the report.

Mr. WILLIS. There is one drawing $75 a month, as shown in the report here.

Mr. MANN. I noticed that. That is probably an error in the report.

Mr. REDFIELD. That is probably an error in the printing of the report.

Mr. WILLIS. Some of the pensioners are not being paid at present. One is paid one-half. Does the gentleman say that the one receiving $40 a month, and is entitled to that much, as a matter of fact is receiving only $20? Is that what the gentleman means to say?

Mr. REDFIELD. Precisely. If I may refer to page 33 of the testimony before the House Committee on the District of Columbia in the Sixtieth Congress, it was said by the head of the department that the average pension is about $40. That average pension is now cut down so that it is only $20. So the chairman then said that if he got the 60 per cent of that it would be $24. And according to the statement of Commissioner Rudolph then practically 60 per cent was paid and 40 per cent was not. That would be $24.

Mr. WILLIS. As the gentleman knows, the limit under the general pension law for widows of soldiers is $12 per month. I notice cases here vastly greater than that. I was wondering what the reason for it was.

Mr. REDFIELD. It is fixed by law.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REDFIELD. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says they are only receiving 60 per cent. The gentleman has information more recent than the report?

Mr. REDFIELD. That is the information I have.

Mr. MANN. The report would show the amount paid out last year from the policemen's pension fund was $80,000 and the firemen's pension fund was nearly $40,000, and the shortage this year is only $25,000. That is a good deal less than the deficiency that the gentleman speaks of. Has the deficiency grown from $25,000 to $50,000 since the gentleman filed a report on this bill on March 28?

Mr. REDFIELD. On page 3 of the report there is shown a deficit in both funds of $15,000. The auditor states that the estimated deficit for the present year is about $25,000.

Mr. MANN. I have that before me.

Mr. REDFIELD. My information, received verbally from members of the board and confirmed verbally by the auditor, is approximately 60 per cent—what it has come to.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but the amount of the total receipts last year in the policemen's fund was $81,000, and the amount in the firemen's fund was $40,000. That is $121,000. Twenty-five thousand dollars is very far from being 40 per cent of that.

Mr. REDFIELD. That is quite true.

Mr. MANN. And I apprehend there has been no change in the estimate since the gentleman filed his report, so that they must be receiving much more than 60 per cent now, unless this 60 per cent relates only to some one month and not to the year.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. REDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman if he would be willing to accept an amendment to his bill referring the proposition to the property owners of the District for an affirmative vote, the act not to become effective until a majority of those voting shall have voted in favor of it?

Mr. REDFIELD. No; I would not.

Mr. SHERLEY. I shall offer such a provision. I believe that a tax of this kind, levied on the people for the purpose of establishing a pension fund, should be levied as the result of a wish to have it, expressed at the polls.

Mr. NYE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. NYE. How would the Government be dealt with in that matter?

Mr. SHERLEY. The Government is paying no part of this tax. The act expressly provides that it shall be paid by the residents of the District of Columbia, and the provision I propose to offer is as follows:

The provisions of this act shall not take effect or be operative, nor shall any tax be levied or collected thereunder, unless a majority of the persons more than 21 years of age who own real or personal property in the District of Columbia and have paid taxes on same for the year 1912 voting at an election to be held for the purpose shall vote in favor of levying such tax. Said election shall be held on such day and between such hours as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall designate by the persons they shall name, and at the places and under such general rules as to the form of ballot, manner of returns, and such other reasonable conditions as they shall impose. All expenses of any election held hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the government of the District of Columbia and shall be reimbursed to said fund out of the first moneys realized from any taxes levied and collected hereunder.

Mr. NYE. The theory being that the property owners should determine how this tax should be levied, I suppose? I wondered how the Government, being a very large property holder in the District, would be represented in such a vote.

Mr. SHERLEY. The Government, as a property owner, could not vote, but because you could not have every property owner vote is no reason why you should not give the people a chance to rule and let them have an opportunity to vote on this question.

Mr. MANN. The Government does not pay any of the tax.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand it does not, and therefore it should not vote, anyway.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. TRIBBLE. A good deal has been said about "the board," and a board fixing the amount of pension, and a board determining the character of the taxables, and so forth. Who is that board?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman can get the accurate information he desires from others better than from myself. All I propose here, and all I shall seek to do at all, is to give to the people who bear the burdens the right to vote on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All general debate has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is the committee proceeding under general debate, or how?

The CHAIRMAN. Under unanimous consent. The time for general debate has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I shall not take any more of the time of the committee until the bill is read and then I shall offer the amendment and speak to it under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed hereafter to cause to be annually levied upon all property in the District of Columbia which is now or which may hereafter become subject to general taxation, such a rate of taxation as will provide such sum or sums as will be sufficient to meet any present or future deficiency in the fund now set aside by law for the payment of police and firemen's pensions and relief in the District of Columbia: Provided, That the tax so levied shall be collected by the collector of taxes in and for the said District of Columbia, and the proceeds thereof shall by him be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the said fund or funds for the payment of the police and firemen's pensions and relief provided by law. The Treasurer of the United States shall from time to time, when the existence of any deficiency in the fund for payment of police and firemen's pensions and relief shall be certified to him in writing by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, pay from the Treasury of the United States the sum or sums necessary to meet said deficiency under the written direction of the said commissioners in order that each person lawfully entitled to any part of said police and firemen's pensions and relief fund may receive the same in full.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 10 and 11, strike out the words "payment of police and firemen's pensions and relief in the District of Columbia: Provided,

That" and insert in lieu thereof the words "benefit of the police relief fund, District of Columbia, and of the firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] where he gets the title of the "firemen's relief fund"? In all the laws that have been passed these are referred to as the "policemen's fund" and the "firemen's fund."

Mr. REDFIELD. The titles were furnished by the auditor of the District of Columbia. He revised the bill carefully.

Mr. MANN. That only illustrates the fact that no one seems to know what the law is.

Mr. REDFIELD. I think the titles are correct.

Mr. MANN. They may be correct. When they go into this law we may improve them. But in no such case is the name referred to in other laws on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 6 and 7, strike out the words "fund or funds for the payment of the police and firemen's pensions and relief" and insert in lieu thereof "police relief fund, District of Columbia, and the firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia, as now."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, strike out the word "Treasurer" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Secretary of the Treasury."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 11 and 12, strike out the words "fund for payment of police and firemen's pensions and relief" and insert in lieu thereof "police relief fund, District of Columbia, or firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 15, strike out the word "pay," after the word "Columbia," and insert in lieu thereof the words "cause to be paid."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 19, strike out the words "police and firemen's pension and relief fund" and insert in lieu thereof the words "police relief fund, District of Columbia, or firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides that in a certain event the Secretary of the Treasury, when a deficiency is certified to him, shall cause to be paid from the Treasury of the United States the sum necessary to meet the deficiency, but there is no appropriation in the bill. The bill does not appropriate the money, and I should think that even the auditor of the District of Columbia, who made these suggestions, would know that under the Constitution of the United States the Secretary of the Treasury can not pay money out of the Treasury unless it is appropriated by Congress. Here is a direction to the Secretary to cause the sum to be paid from the Treasury, but there is no appropriation of the sum. I suppose the bill will not become a law in that shape, but if it should, probably it would be valueless.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 16, after the word "States," insert the words "as hereinafter provided."

Mr. FITZGERALD. As I understand section 2, it provides that whatever money is paid shall be paid out of funds in the Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia. This provision contemplates the payment of these pensions by the Secretary of the Treasury out of the general fund. This amendment would simply make any payments that are to be made payable out of the funds to the credit of the District.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman regard the provision in the bill that the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be paid from the Treasury certain sums a sufficient authority for the Secretary of the Treasury to get the money out of the Treasury without an appropriation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, in addition to the provision of the Constitution to which the gentleman from Illinois calls attention, that no money shall be paid out of the Treasury unless appropriated by Congress, there is a general statute which provides that no words in any act shall be construed as making an appropriation unless the appropriation is made in terms. But this is not to cover the point the gentleman brings up.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is to eliminate any question when the payment is made, if there be any, as to the particular fund from which the payment shall be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect upon its passage.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out line 22, page 2, and insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That the tax, the levy and collection of which is herein provided for, shall be an additional one, over and above the tax rate now provided for by general law, and the proceeds thereof shall not be used for any purpose other than that hereinbefore authorized. Said tax shall be levied and collected, as above provided, by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia at the same time as the tax on all property now subject to general taxation in the said District. There shall be no contribution to either of the aforesaid funds, either directly or indirectly, from the United States. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby directed, on the 1st day of each and every month until the first collection of taxes under this act shall have become available, to draw a requisition upon the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for such sum or sums as will, when added to the amount already to the credit of each of the hereinbefore-named funds, be sufficient to pay in full the amount lawfully due each and every person upon the roll of the police relief fund, District of Columbia, as well as those upon the roll of the firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia; and the said Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be paid the amount of said requisition for the said purposes out of any moneys in the Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia which can, in the opinion of the said commissioners, be spared for the time being from any fund held by the said Treasury for the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That any money so used shall be repaid to the fund from which it was taken out of the first money collected under the tax herein provided for: And provided further, That no part of the money gathered under said levy shall be paid to those upon the rolls of either of the said two relief funds until all of the money taken out of the Treasury as aforesaid shall have been refunded thereto."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, after line 4, insert as a new section the following:

"The provisions of this act shall not take effect or be operative nor shall any tax be levied or collected thereunder unless a majority of the persons more than 21 years of age, who own real or personal property in the District of Columbia and have paid taxes on same for the year 1912, voting at an election to be held for the purpose, shall vote in favor of levying such tax. Said election shall be held on such day and between such hours as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall designate and by the persons they shall name and at the places and under such general rules as to form of ballot, manner of returns, and such other reasonable conditions as they shall impose. All expenses of any election held hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the government of the District of Columbia and shall be reimbursed to said fund out of the first moneys realized from any taxes levied and collected hereunder."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the language of the amendment clearly discloses its purpose. It is the kind of referendum that most of us are familiar with in similar form in our States. In the State of Kentucky for years we have had in the constitution a referendum provision whereby bond issues should not be authorized until after an affirmative vote of the people. This bill proposes a tax upon the people of the District of Columbia alone, and it is a tax for a specific purpose. It involves a question easily understood, and about which the people of the District could, at a referendum vote, clearly express their opinion. In my judgment, they should be given the opportunity to express an opinion upon the wisdom of this legislation before it becomes finally effective.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman provides only for a vote of the property owners.

Mr. SHERLEY. I confine the vote to those who bear the burden of taxes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does not the gentleman think that rents in the District of Columbia are high enough to cover the amount of the taxes? Does not the renter pay the tax?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to go into the theory of the single tax or whether a tax is distributed on others. I am simply taking the perfectly obvious course of having those who directly pay the tax have a right to say whether they should have this further burden placed upon them.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does the gentleman know of any State that gives only the property owners the right to vote upon a question of this kind and not all of the legal voters?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think there are quite a number of States that give this right to the taxpayers upon certain questions.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Can the gentleman name any one State?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know that I could name any one offhand.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman does not know of any one State that he can name.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have not undertaken to examine the laws of the different States, but I have a positive impression to that effect. Whether there be any States that have such laws would not necessarily determine my judgment as to the wisdom of this provision. What I propose here is simply to allow those who have the burden placed upon them to have a voice in saying whether it shall be placed there.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in the referendum vote in Kentucky is the vote limited to just those who are property owners?

Mr. SHERLEY. My impression is that it is not. I do not care to take further time of the committee.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Over half the population of this city is a moving population, is it not; and the gentleman wants to place in the citizen who lives here and pays taxes the right to vote upon this question?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is necessary that there should be some provision indicating an eligibility to vote. I have not restricted it to sex. I have taken the usual age of 21 years, and have simply provided that any person in the District who pays a tax, no matter how small, and upon whom would thereby fall the burden of this act, shall have the right to express his or her view on the matter before the act finally becomes operative.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the referendum in proper matters of legislation, and yet I do not think that this is a case where the referendum ought to be applied. If this were an entirely new proposition and we were determining whether or not we would establish pensions for police or firemen, then there might be some reason for submitting it to a vote of the people.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILL. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman support a provision that we shall submit to the people that original proposition and on their vote determine the existence of the present pension law?

Mr. HAMILL. No; and for this reason, that the people have evidently given their assent to the establishment of a police and firemen's pension system in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERLEY. How?

Mr. HAMILL. By the fact that for years they have paid into the pension funds moneys accruing from fines in the police courts and moneys accruing from dog licenses——

Mr. SHERLEY. Did they have any option in the matter?

Mr. HAMILL. Wait one moment—their own money. They have paid it into this pension fund, and this Legislature has never heard a word of complaint about it from the people of the District.

Mr. SHERLEY. Did they not have to pay it under the law?

Mr. HAMILL. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Did they have any option in the matter?

Mr. HAMILL. The point I am making is that the gentleman is supposing that there is some dissatisfaction with this proposition to maintain a police and firemen's pension fund.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is not holding any opinion one way or the other. He is not supposing that there is an objection to it; neither is he supposing that there is favorable consideration of it. He is simply proposing to take the only practical way of finding out.

Mr. HAMILL. I say that the fact that the police and firemen's pension system has been acquiesced in without objection is proof that it is acceptable to the people of this District. Briefly speaking, this is the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky: The people of the District established a pension fund; they intended to pay every man the amount of pension to which he was entitled. Now, owing to the falling off of the revenues in the sources they provided, it is necessary to come to this Legislature in order to obtain sufficient moneys whereby the people of the District of Columbia can pay their debts, and the gentleman from Kentucky wants this Legislature to ask the people of the District, through the cumbrous and expensive machinery of a municipal election, whether or not they ought to be compelled to pay their honest debts.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILL. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. Do I understand that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] advocates the referendum in this matter?

Mr. HAMILL. Yes; he does.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a word. I am very much pleased to vote for an amendment to give the people an opportunity to say whether they want a law or not. I am a believer in the referendum as far as we are able to carry it to the people. Especially is that so when it comes to the levying of taxes, and matters that affect them directly. I think it will be somewhat refreshing to the country when this House goes on record as supporting the matter of the referendum for the District of Columbia. The people have some rights in this country in reference to legislation that a legislative body may enact into law, and many times if the people had an opportunity to express themselves on legislation they would not approve of it. Also, many times, if they had an opportunity to initiate legislation which legislative bodies refuse to enact, they would put it into force.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is in favor of a referendum that goes back to the legal voters, or simply goes to the taxpayers?

Mr. FOSTER. I am for the legal voters.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. This proposition goes back, however, to only part of the legal voters.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a step in the right direction, and I am for giving the people the right to say what they want—a right for all the people to express themselves.

Mr. HAMILL. Would it not be just as sensible to attach a referendum to a proposition to repave a street as it would be to attach a referendum to this bill to replete the pension fund?

Mr. FOSTER. I do think this, that there are many streets in cities that are paved which if the people had an opportunity to express themselves about would not be paved.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, is there not a referendum in the State of Illinois on the pavement of a street?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Where two-thirds of the property owners can absolutely stop the pavement of the street?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. We have that law in the State of Illinois. A few years ago the State of Illinois voted by nearly 500,000 majority for the initiative and referendum. The people, regardless of party—Democrats and Republicans—voted for such a law to be passed by the legislature.

But we have not been able yet to secure what we voted for at that time, because the legislature refused to pass it.

Mr. HAMILL. Is not this the law of Illinois, not that there is a general referendum on the paving of streets, but that the property owners along the section to be improved vote upon it, based upon a certain proportion of the value of the property or the number of residents in giving their assent to the improvement?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say that is a referendum.

Mr. MANN. That is a real referendum.

Mr. FOSTER. And the people who have to bear the burden of taxation are those who are directly interested——

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman is familiar with the laws providing for the pavement of streets in the city of Chicago?

Mr. FOSTER. Not very much.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is not the gentleman sufficiently informed to know that property owners holding vacant property for speculation purposes obstruct the improvement of the streets, and do you not know—I think the gentleman is familiar with this——

Mr. FOSTER. I have not had much experience with the pavement of streets in the city of Chicago, but what little I have had they usually put down pavements when they want to and usually charge the price they want to, and I think my colleague can testify to that.

Mr. KENDALL. That is in the silk-stocking ward, where a majority of them live.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think it is confined to any particular ward of Chicago.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I hope my colleague is not in favor of a referendum which will provide for turning it over to property owners only to vote.

Mr. FOSTER. It might be a little difficult from any proposition, but I think on any proposition that affects the general welfare of the people they ought to be allowed to vote and say whether it is good or not, and it does not matter whether the man had $1 worth of property or $10,000 worth of property. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. I want to say I will never vote for a proposition for a referendum that does not give all the citizens the right to vote upon it.

Mr. FOSTER. I am for the right of all citizens to take part in this government and vote on all propositions affecting them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I can not think that the gentleman from Kentucky, in offering this amendment, means to be taken seriously. I have too much respect for his business judgment and his sober sense to think that he means this amendment, and if it should be attached to this bill—in the first place, I object to the amendment because it makes a mountain out of a molehill. When a man pays on his property, which is assessed at $10,000, which is two-thirds of its value, an annual tax of 85 cents, which is all he would pay if the present deficiency is supposed to be doubled, I do not think he is going to be worried very much as to whether that serious burden of taxation is imposed upon him or not.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REDFIELD. In a moment. I object to the amendment on the plain ordinary business ground that the cost of the referendum election called for by it would largely exceed the amount of the tax, and it does not seem to me good sense when a man is asked to spend 85 cents if he happens to have $15,000 worth of property to ask him to spend three or four dollars to determine whether he will expend 85 cents or not. Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BOWMAN. I see in the report the total deficiency of the firemen's relief fund was $5,260. That is for 1911, and that the policemen's relief fund is $10,304. What is the total up to the present time of the deficiency?

Mr. REDFIELD. It is estimated that the deficiency for the present year may be about $25.000. That would be assessed upon $355,000,000 worth of property, and on page 5 of the report will be found a statement that the result would be a tax of 85 cents a year upon property assessed on the two-thirds valuation at $10,000, or, in other words, 85 cents a year on property actually valued at $15,000, and all that action is based upon an assumed deficit of $30,000, so on the present basis it will be 42½ cents a year, and the cost of an election of the kind would be probably $50,000 or $80,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. In my city, nearly the size of this, we can hold an election for not exceeding $5,000 or $6,000, and I have no doubt it can be done here. Now, I would like to know how much money would be received by this tax the first year?

Mr. REDFIELD. The amount would be $15,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well. The gentleman figures it costs more to have the referendum on the theory that it would cost $40,000 for an election. This is not New York.

Mr. REDFIELD. The gentleman forgets that in this city of Washington there is no election machinery and that he must create all the election machinery before he can hold an election.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is what makes me say that we can do it cheaper than they can in New York.

Mr. REDFIELD. And the mere creation of that machinery, for which I regret his amendment fails to provide—in fact, I am not sure it is not open to a point of order, inasmuch as it calls for that to be done for which there is no lawful means of doing—would seem to make it impossible to carry out that amendment, even though he does offer it in all the sincerity which I have found characteristic of him. I hope the amendment will fail.

Mr. SHERLEY. It will be noted that the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] has found nothing sufficiently strong to urge against this amendment to insure its defeat and has been forced to the position of questioning the sincerity of the gentleman from Kentucky. He is so much a New Yorker that he is unable to get out of his mind the extravagant cost of primary and election machinery that is incident to that great Commonwealth. I beg to assure him that this can be done for a much less sum than the amount of tax that will be raised in one year. It will enlighten Congress very much on questions of taxation, and perhaps teach us salutary lessons about imposing upon people the burdens of taxation without a serious consideration of the subject.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words:
"Who own real or personal property in the District of Columbia and have paid taxes on same for the year 1912."

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say I am not much in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. If you are going to pension certain classes of people for public services, I think those pensions ought to be paid. I do not object to a referendum, but I do object to a referendum that shall not go back to all the people, but only to a part of them. If this amendment should be adopted, it will simply mean that it would go back to all the people of this District.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry? How does he propose, speaking practically now, to have a referendum that does not have some limitation as to those who are entitled to vote? Washington is a peculiar city, with a changing, shifting population that does not have the permanency of other cities, and without, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] suggested, having at present any election machinery. I suggest to the gentleman that my amendment goes further than the law of Indiana, where the gentleman has voted for so many years, because this permits the women as well as the men to vote, and the women and men who are taxpayers in the District represent a very much larger proportion of the population than the electorate in the State of Indiana.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. We give certain pensions in the State of Indiana. I do not know of a single pension granted by the law in the State of Indiana that does not provide a fund to pay for it without any referendum vote, nor do I know of any law in Indiana which limits the right of suffrage to property owners.

Now, the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] concerning the difficulties of arranging a vote in this District goes very far to show that his amendment ought not to be adopted, because it shows that the amendment will practically defeat the whole purpose of the proposed law. If my amendment does nothing more than that, I shall be glad to have offered it. I favor paying in full the pensions to the disabled and retired policemen and firemen according to the rates in the existing law. If this intent of the law is to be referred to any authority other than the Members of Congress, it ought to be referred to all the people and not referred to the taxpayers alone.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favor of submitting all those questions which have for their object the increase of the burdens of taxation to the people who pay the increased tax. But, Mr. Chairman, I could not hold my respect for the poor people of this city and of this Republic if I did not stand here and defend their right to cast their vote upon questions of this character. To say that a certain part of the population of this city should not have a right to cast a vote upon taxation because of the fact that that population is without real estate or without personal property is to deprive that class of people of the right of franchise.

And I never intend to vote for any proposition, wherever it may come up in my presence and where I have a right to vote, to deprive the poor of the same rights that the rich claim for themselves. It is unjust, it is unpatriotic, it is un-American in its character. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am very heartily in favor of the amendment which is proposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. I favor this amendment because it gives the right of the people, rich and poor alike, to pass upon the questions to increase taxation. The people ought to have the right to settle all such questions, but the original amendment disfranchises a part of the people of the District of Columbia solely on the ground that they are poor people. This is not in harmony with the fundamental principles of this Government, and if his amendment passes without the passage of the pending amendment thereto it will enact a new national policy basing the right of franchise upon the ownership of property, and, in my opinion, be unconstitutional.

I am aware of the fact that there are some conditions existing in this city which is embarrassing to some extent, because I understand that there are no fixed methods and preparation for holding elections, but this ought not to be urged as a reason for not permitting the people to decide questions of local taxation. They have been deprived of local self-government too long now, and I think Congress should speedily provide for such self-government and give them the right to the ballot box, so that they may wisely inaugurate a municipal policy wherein the active and intelligent citizens of this city may exert their energies for improvement and extention of the power and influence of this Capital City—the pride of every American citizen.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that the amendment to the amendment will pass.

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment do now close.

Mr. SHERLEY. You had better make it 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that all debate on this amendment do now close.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] moves that debate close in five minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. REDFIELD. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Those in favor of the motion will rise and stand until they are counted.

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my motion for a division. I ask unanimous consent to close debate in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that debate close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. We ought to have more time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard just a moment on this amendment. It will be noticed that this bill proposes in a way to violate what is called the organic act of the District of Columbia, providing that one-half of the expenses shall be paid out of the Federal Treasury. If that change in the law is to be carried through by this bill, it ought to be carried through in such a way that no one in the District can hereafter turn around, if this bill goes into effect, and claim that the Federal Treasury should pay one-half of the expense; and the only way that can be avoided is to let the people of the District have an opportunity to vote in favor of the act. I am in favor of putting the people on record, so that they can not hereafter come to Congress and say, "You have violated the organic-act agreement, and now you must pay half of this expense out of the Federal Treasury." If they vote for it, it will not lie in their mouths to complain of the effects of it hereafter.

Now, as to voting in the District, you can not say that everybody indiscriminately can vote, and you can not say they can vote anywhere, or that they can vote unless they are duly qualified voters, or anything of that sort.

If you do that, there is no way of limiting the time or places of voting, and some enterprising gentlemen might vote in different places. It would not be fair to say that no one can vote on a proposition of this sort except legal voters in the District of Columbia, because those who are working in the departments here and have retained their residences at home—elsewhere—who have bought houses here, ought to be permitted to vote equally on the question with those who have lived here all their lives and who have no voting residence outside.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILL. On a question of this kind does not the gentleman think we first ought to have a statute mapping out a scheme of voting and specifying who can vote, before we attempt to put a question by a referendum to the vote of the people?

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman's proposition leaves it to the District Commissioners to say how a man shall indicate his intention or his opinion. It is a very easy matter for the District Commissioners to provide for election districts, or election officers, or the regulation of elections. It requires no genius to do that. All that is required is that a man shall go through some statute and examine it in relation to the subject. There is no difficulty in having an election at all. Those who live here, who are employed in the departments or otherwise, who own property here, even though they have voting residences elsewhere, ought to be given a chance to say whether they desire to put themselves on record in favor of this proposition, and if they do, it will not lie in their mouths hereafter to complain that part of the money does not come out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I am very much surprised and pleased at the sudden development of sentiment for the referendum here in Congress. But when they propose a measure or an amendment for a referendum that applies only to a vote of the property holders, it has the earmarks of plutocracy on it, from my point of view, and therefore I am opposed to any such amendment.

I have been all my life in favor of the referendum on matters that concern the people, and I believe that any resident of this District has as much right to vote upon a question of this kind as has any property owner, who probably does not live here at all; and therefore the amendment, if passed in its original form without modification, would be very objectionable to me.

I would like to know, though, why it is so necessary to have a referendum on this particular question of taxation and none on any other question of taxation. We have here in the District of Columbia something which to my mind is a reflection on Congress. We have two street car companies that are given the power to tax those who use the street cars of Washington and the District of Columbia. Why would it not be proper to give the people a chance to vote on that question, and refer that matter to a referendum, and see what they would do as to that?

How many of the Congressmen would now be ready to take up and pass a resolution to give the people of this community some relief from the robbery committed by the street car companies in this city in the way of two transfer systems? In other words, why not give the people a chance to vote on the question of universal transfers in the District of Columbia?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Why is it so necessary now to start in on a small portion of the taxation—which provides for what? To take care of those who have served the city of Washington and the District of Columbia, and those who are dependent on them and who are in need of some kind of support.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I simply want to say to the gentleman that I can speak only for myself, but for myself I will be very glad if any sort of plan can be devised to enable the people of the District of Columbia, or even Congress, to deal with the street railways of this District.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am glad to know that. I hope a large majority of the Members here feel the same way about it. We certainly need relief from those corporations.

Mr. LOBECK. And while we are waiting for this referendum on the small sum of $15,000 to $25,000, which referendum will cost us from $5,000 to $10,000, needy men, women, and children will have to wait on this great body for a chance to supply their wants.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. When we have a regular pension bill coming up, both for the school-teachers of this District and a general pension law, then let us refer the whole matter when it counts for something in dollars and cents.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; refer the whole thing to a referendum, and I will be for it. I am not in favor of referring this small matter to a referendum, and therefore delaying the giving of this relief to the policemen and firemen of the city of Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I ask to have the amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "who own real or personal property in the District of Columbia and have paid taxes on same for the year 1912."

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. FOWLER. Division!

The CHAIRMAN. The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. FOWLER. I asked for a division before the announcement of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. TRIBBLE. I have an amendment.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I asked for a division on the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois did not rise.

Mr. FOWLER. I was rising, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now before the committee is the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. FOSTER. Can we not have the division that was called for by my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the question has been decided.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the Chair decide that when a man is rising in the attempt to get a division there can be no division?

The CHAIRMAN. No one rose until after the question had been put and decided.

Mr. FOSTER. I myself saw the gentleman getting up.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE], which the Clerk will report.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to know if the rules of this House provide that on a request for a division it can not be had unless the man who is asking for it stands straight?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that neither the gentleman from Illinois nor anyone else rose and asked for a division until after the question had been determined.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, before the Chair had announced the vote I asked for a division.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will pardon me, I do not think the Chair would intentionally in any case take advantage of my colleague from Illinois. My colleague did not at first rise, but did ask for a division and then rose. I think the Chair did not hear my colleague. It has been the invariable practice, where a gentleman asked for a division without rising, to grant the division, if the Chair heard the demand, unless some one made the point of order. My colleague did rise before any other proceeding took place. I think in fairness, if the Chair did not hear him, he having attempted to ask for a division, he is entitled to a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no disposition to cut off anything like that.

Mr. MANN. We know that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] demands a division. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] offer an amendment?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, which is an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3 insert the word "male" between the word "the" and the word "persons," so that it will read "unless a majority of the male persons."

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. SHERLEY), there were—ayes 38, noes 38.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. SHERLEY and Mr. REDFIELD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 50.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next section of the bill.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House, with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLDFIELD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 20840) to provide for deficiencies in the fund for police and firemen's pensions and relief in the District of Columbia, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. REDFIELD. I demand a separate vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] to section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the other amendments will be voted on in gross.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, after line 4, insert as a new section:

"The provisions of this act shall not take effect or be operative nor shall any tax be levied or collected thereunder, unless a majority of the persons, more than 21 years of age, who own real or personal property in the District of Columbia and have paid taxes on the same for the year 1912, voting at an election to be held for the purpose, shall vote in favor of levying such tax. Said election shall be held on such day and between such hours as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall designate, and by the persons they shall name, and at the places and under such general rules as to form of ballot, manner of returns, and such other reasonable conditions as they shall impose.

"All expenses of any election held hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the government of the District of Columbia, and shall be reimbursed to such fund out of the first moneys realized from any taxes levied and collected hereunder."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, which has just been reported by the Clerk.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SHERLEY) there were—ayes 49, noes 63.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The point of order is sustained. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, the Clerk will call the roll, and the question will be taken on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 124, nays 119, answered "present" 11, not voting 136, as follows:

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21279, the Post Office appropriation bill, with Mr. HAY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that it would not be necessary for me to further discuss this amendment, which I had the honor to introduce. However, since the fight against the proposition has not remained in this House, but has been carried to the press, I feel constrained to say a few words more. I hold in my hand an editorial published yesterday in the Washington Times which severely arraigns those of us who favor my amendment. I believe that every gentleman who opposes the bill on this floor has his argument fully stated in this editorial, and therefore in replying to the editorial it will be a reply to them. Nothing so tends to promote civilization as newspapers and roads, provided they are good roads and square newspapers. [Applause.] I do not know why the Washington Times has found it necessary to devote so many editorials to this proposition. I do not know who is stimulating that paper to do this. Evidently it has had some sort of stimulation. It has very carefully and very succinctly reproduced the arguments of gentlemen who have spoken against this bill upon the floor, and if it were not for the high character of those Members of Congress I might assume they had clandestinely gotten these things into the columns of this paper through some friendly reporter or otherwise. [Applause.] Or it may be that the owner of the Washington Times, who is a magnate in the Steel Trust and interested in manufacturing automobiles, prefers a different sort of a road scheme, one which will promote the sales of automobiles. They do not want money spent on dirt roads, so they can have the more left [applause] to build that famous highway we have heard so much about, leading from Boston on down by New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh, Chicago, Denver, and along to the Golden Gate, in order that automobile travelers can ride along in pleasant pastime while the farmers travel over mud roads to get to the railway station.

I will read this editorial by paragraphs and comment as I go:

THE GOOD ROADS PROBLEM.

The scheme pending in Congress to pay rent to local authorities for the use of roads over which rural mail carriers deliver mail is represented by its advocates to be a good-roads measure.

That much of the article is true.

It is their purpose to pillory such sensible and courageous Members of Congress as oppose it as opponents of good roads. This is the danger in this most vicious piece of legislation.

Mr. Chairman, who is trying to "pillory" anybody? If there is a man on this floor who is opposed to this bill I commend to him the honest policy of getting up and saying, "I am opposed to it; I am going to give it a square fight and defeat it if I can." I would not, if I could, "pillory" any man for making a direct fight against this measure. I can not look otherwise than with disfavor on those gentlemen who say, "I am for your bill, but I want to put such oblique amendments to it that it will look like a crazy quilt when we get through with it."

"Pillory?" This paper is "pillorying" everybody who is willing to vote for anything that it calls a "dirt road." It wants no money wasted on the dirt roads of the people, so there may be a larger amount left to build cross-continent automobile roads.

The bill says not one word about spending this money for building, improving, or maintaining roads. It merely gives the money to the local authority or, in the case of turnpike companies, to the private corporation that owns the road.

Mr. Chairman, not a letter or line of this bill says anything about compensation to a private turnpike company. Why did not this editorial tell the truth? This false statement was for the evident purpose of misleading Members of the House. The Government is already paying private turnpike companies for the use of their roads. Some gentlemen complain when we propose to do for the counties and States the things we are already doing for the private turnpike companies, ferry companies, and toll-bridge companies. Why should not the Government be as liberal with the States and counties as it is with the private turnpike companies?

It will cost $18,000,000 the first year and soon will mount up to an annual charge of $50,000,000 or $60,000,000.

Whoever inspired that misrepresented the bill. If every road in the United States over which rural mail is carried were immediately put in condition described by this bill, it would not then amount to $18,000,000. The probabilities are that the first year this bill would cost $5,000,000 or $6,000,000. It would grow rapidly from year to year until post roads are all improved. Within five or six years it would probably reach an appropriation of $17,000,000 or $18,000,000 per year. Why not fight it fair? Why not tell the truth?

It is said on the authority of the best highway engineers in the country that to properly maintain all the roads of this country at the state of perfection of the English country roads would cost more than the total value of the grain crops of the country.

The Times and some Members of this House do not want a system of roads that goes around to all the people who pay for them. What they want is that all the people shall be taxed to build a few fancy roads for a few fancy people and then let the rest of the people build for themselves the roads they need or do without.

Local road builders may discriminate and build roads first where they will be most useful and where they are most needed, avoiding this crushing expense, but to follow the rural mail carriers will be to erect a road system without any plan or any purpose, and yet to drain the Treasury of untold hundreds of millions.

Why do they not say "billions"? I remember one time when I was a little fellow I was telling some story that was hardly warranted by the facts; an old neighbor patted me on the head and said, "DORSEY, don't ever be a liar, but if you will start out on that nefarious line, do not be a little liar. Be a whopper." [Laughter.] Whoever inspired this editorial must have heard my old friend give me that admonition, and when he started in to criticize this bill he concluded he would tell a "whopper." In 10 years this bill would not reach $20,000,000 a year.

But this measure, advanced by the 28 dirt-road statesmen, doesn't contain one word that directs one cent of these millions of dollars to be spent on the roads.

Aye, that is a familiar sound. I think I have heard that before in the corridors and cloakrooms of this Capitol. I think I have heard it when sitting around the hotel offices. What is there to it? It is simply another unfair assault on an honest measure that is before this House, demanding the attention of Congress:

This measure * * * does not contain one word that directs one cent of these millions of dollars to be spent on the roads.

No. Why? Because this bill provides that not one dollar shall be paid to any State or county until that State or county has already spent the money necessary to make the road. And then after the State or county has gone to the expense of building the road, has gone to the expense of maintaining it for a year, then and not till then the Government pays a toll for the use it has already had. The measure was written in this form because it was desired to leave the States and civil subdivisions thereof in full control of their own roads.

We want every State and every county and every municipality to say for themselves where their roads shall be built, to say of what material they shall be built, and in what condition they shall be kept. The Government will only have to say whether a given road comes up to the specifications prescribed, and if so, to pay its reasonable share for the use of that highway in the exercise of its Federal function of transporting the mail.

Mr. Chairman, I read further from this document on the subject of "dirt-road statesmen." Now——

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, a gentleman here has suggested to me that a turnpike road in his district received a compensation from the Federal Government for the use of that road of $5 per annum. Just to illustrate for a moment. Is it proposed under this bill that a road like that would get $25 per mile per annum?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. No; it is not.

Mr. Chairman, reading further from this editorial:

The only purpose is to take money out of the Treasury to be spent in the districts to enable some Members of Congress to brag that they are good appropriation getters.

If that were the truth about me, then I were an odious man. If that were the truth about any other Member of this House, then he were a corrupt scoundrel and ought to be put in another place than on this floor. But it is not the truth. It is a contemptible attempt to "pillory" Members so they shall be afraid to support this measure, which they favor.

That this is its evident purpose is proved by the fact that this bill, which is not a bill, but a rider on an appropriation bill, has been so handled that it can be known by different names in different States. In Tennessee it may be the Byrns bill, in Iowa the Prouty bill, in Missouri the Shackleford bill, in Kansas the Campbell bill, and so on.

Mr. Chairman, I can not for the life of me understand how a Member experienced in this House should let his eyes turn green with envy because some other Member has credit for having written or helped to write this or any other bill. "The Byrns bill"—that refers to my handsome friend, JOE BYRNS, of Tennessee. I have never heard that JOE BYRNS ever claimed, in Tennessee or elsewhere, to be the author of this bill; but in justice to Mr. BYRNS and in order that the country and the good people of Tennessee should understand the truth I must say that JOE BYRNS helped to put this bill into shape. His thought had as much to do with it as that of any other man, and it was due to his efforts alone that this bill was put in such form that the classes A and B were made to conform in width to the good roads of Tennessee and some other States.

Missouri is proud of JOE BYRNS. Why should not Tennessee be? Then there is my good friend MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, representing the Memphis district. If he will step up and say, "I am one of the authors of this bill," it will not be humiliating to me. It will simply be the plain, unvarnished truth. Indeed, Tennessee has had much to do with putting this measure forward. MOON, AUSTIN, HULL, SELLS, MCKELLAR, and BYRNS have all done their part and done it well. Twenty-five or thirty men wrote this bill together. "The Prouty bill"—yes; Judge PROUTY, of Iowa, I would say, also helped to frame this bill. What better man than he could be found to aid in such a work. [Applause.] Better than all, the solid Iowa delegation is backing the bill which he helped to prepare.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I regret I have not the time. I can not. I wish I could.

"The Campbell bill"—the gentleman from Kansas helped to write this bill, as did also Mr. TAGGART, Mr. NEELEY, and Mr. ANTHONY. All over this country the advocates of goods roads got together in response to the Democratic and Republican national platforms. They put aside all pride of authorship and devoted patient labor to the preparation of this measure. Is it any worse for that? Others who neglected to give attention to the needs and demands of the people are now consumed with envy for fear somebody else will get credit for duty performed.

To cripple this bill they have gotten up and offered all sorts of amendments to make it odious. They do not fight it openly. Why? Because the people would not tolerate an open attack.

The editorial which I have been reading from says we are voting for this measure because we know the Senate will not pass it. That is not the truth. The Frank Munsey paper down here thinks that the Senators are plutocrats and aristocrats, and that they will not vote for what people want; that they would vote appropriations for transcontinental automobile roads, but nothing for their dirt-road constituencies. There are just as patriotic men in the Senate as in the House; they will stand up and faithfully represent their dirt-road constituents just as faithfully as will we. [Applause.] I am not afraid of the Senate. I have an abiding faith that this will be law.

It is said that the States and counties do not ask for it. They do. I said the other day, and I repeat it now, that the only way that any constituency can properly ask for anything is through the mouth of its Representative upon this floor. The people of my district are asking for it now, through my voice. The people of the other States are asking for it through their Representatives, who are authorized to speak for them on this floor. Do the people of my State want this legislation? Here they stand, every member of the delegation answering "yes." Do the people of Ohio want this legislation? The answer is "yes," given by Messrs. ALLEN, COX, GOEKE, ANSBERRY, WILLIS, SHERWOOD, SWITZER, CLAYPOOL, TAYLOR, ANDERSON, SHARP, WHITE, ASHBROOK, WHITACRE, BATHRICK, and HOWLAND. These men are commissioned to speak for the people of that great State, and they are demanding the passage of the bill. Every Member here has been empowered to speak for his constituents. Three-fourths of the Members thus empowered are asking for the passage of this bill. Then who shall say the people are not asking for the passage of this bill?

Mr. Chairman, this is a good bill, and I say it not because I have pride in its authorship, but because 30 or 40 Members who have studied the subject of good roads have laid their pride of authorship aside and have all gotten together and executed this excellent piece of work. They have done it without any hope of getting vainglory out of it. They have labored that the people of this blessed country should have the civilizing influences of easy and convenient ways of travel.

Mr. Chairman, in derision the advocates of this measure have been called "knights of the dirt roads." Sir, there is no discredit, but honor, in that title. It had never been my hope nor my ambition to belong to the nobility, but I accept with ardor the appellation "knight of the dirt roads." There are more than 250 Members of this House who are as ardently for this bill as am I. I hail these Members as brothers, "sir knights of the dirt roads." Let our coats of arms be a highway laying across a plain and down a valley, with happy homes dotted along its way. This coat of arms will foreshadow the beneficent results which we had in mind when we fought for this bill.

These roads will enable our farmers to get their products to market more promptly and cheaply, thus giving to the consumer his food fresher and at lower cost. These roads will give to our rural communities better schools and churches. These roads will give our farmers more opportunities for the benefits and joys of social intercourse. These roads will turn the tide from the cities back to the farms. With such a system of good roads more than ever will the farm be the nursery in which will be reared the leaders of our civilization. Future generations will rise up to bless the "knights of the dirt roads."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. SIMS. It is to come in after the words "this act."

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "this act," in the amendment, insert the following: "That for the purposes of this act all highways of the several States and the civil subdivisions thereof, or any part of same, used by the United States for the purpose of transporting rural mail, in addition to the roads hereinbefore mentioned and described, are hereby declared to be post roads; that the Postmaster General, under such rules and regulations as may be provided by him, by and with the cooperation and consent of the State and county or other local authority having charge of the construction, operation, and maintenance of such roads shall, by contract or otherwise, cause all such roads or parts of roads not so improved by said State or local authority to be provided with ample side ditches so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, and be continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means."

Mr. LEVER. I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. I make the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] is not germane to the amendment made in order by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Before that is passed on I should like to have the opportunity to say a word.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard on that. The bill reported by the Committee on Rules and made in order on this bill is framed on the theory of paying rents to local communities for the use of the property of the local community. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] is an absolutely antagonistic proposition, built up upon the theory that the Federal Government itself should construct the post roads of the country, or the roads used for the delivery of rural mail upon them. It seems to me that the two propositions are so opposite, so entirely antagonistic, that the one can not be germane to the other. I therefore make the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, under the rule adopted by the House I insist that it is not necessary for an amendment to be germane. If the Chair will refer to page 4 of the rule which was adopted, he will see that it reads:

It shall also be in order, notwithstanding the general rules of the House, to consider in connection with said H. R. 21279 the following—

And then appears the provision which is now pending as an amendment.

One of the general rules of the House which is waived by the adoption of the rule reported from the Committee on Rules is subdivision 7 of Rule XVI, which provides that no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

Under the general rules of parliamentary procedure amendments need not be germane. Any amendment proposed to a pending proposition can be considered by the body in which it is submitted.

It is a general rule long in force in the House of Representatives that no amendment shall be considered unless it be germane to the proposition under consideration; but the House having, by the adoption of a special rule for the purpose of the consideration of this provision, provided that the general rules of the House shall not interfere with the consideration, any amendment proposed, whether germane or otherwise, is proper to be considered by the committee.

If this construction be not given to the special rule, then the words "notwithstanding the general rules of the House" must be construed to mean nothing. Without these words the provision would have been in order under the special rule. The inclusion of them, if they are given effect, is to take from the operation of other rules the provision during its consideration.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, the point of order I make against the amendment is not that it is against the rules, but the amendment which I offered provides that the United States shall, in certain cases, make compensation to the States and civil subdivisions thereof for the use of their roads, but makes no provision whatever for constructing roads by the Government. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee provides that in certain cases the United States shall construct post roads. Clearly, a provision to construct post roads is not germane to a provision to rent post roads.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit that the proposition advanced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] can not possibly be well taken. The rule, by its very terms makes the good-roads amendment in order, the general rules of the House to the contrary notwithstanding, as the lawyer's phrase runs, but it goes no further. The rule can not possibly operate to make all amendments to the amendment in order, and provide that they shall have immunity from the operation of the general rules of the House. Unless there is something in the special rule itself to make that true, the point raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is obviously not well taken. The rule applies exclusively to the roads amendment. This amendment is now in order, whatever the general rules of the House may provide. These rules can not be invoked to prevent this body from considering in Committee of the Whole, this particular amendment relating to good-roads amendment. This being so the operation of the rule stops at this point, and the rules of the House will apply to all amendments that may be offered to this particular amendment.

There is nothing in the report of the Committee on Rules which gives immunity to amendments to this amendment, and provides for their consideration, irrespective of the general rules. I think that the mere reading of the rule makes this obvious. What provision of the report of the Committee on Rules, or portion of its language, can be appealed to in support of the proposition that any amendment, however lacking in germaneness, may be offered in order to this particular proposition? Would Schedule K be in order?

I submit, as I said in the beginning, that the point of the gentleman from New York is obviously not well taken, and that although it is true that no point of order may be relied upon, or called into play to prevent this committee from considering the roads amendment, yet amendments to this amendment are subject to the general rules of the House prevailing in Committee of the Whole. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is not in order unless it is germane. On this point I have nothing to say.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the language of the rule:

Resolved, That after the adoption of this rule it shall be in order in the consideration of H. R. 21279, a bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, to consider the new legislation on said bill hereinafter mentioned, notwithstanding the general rules of the House.

There is one rule which if it were desired to waive could have been expressly waived, but the House waived the general rules of the House. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] is very much mistaken when he says that under general parliamentary law an amendment must be germane. I have here a decision, paragraph 5825, volume 5, Hinds' Precedents, wherein it was expressly held that under the common parliamentary law amendments need not be germane. It is only the general rule of the House prohibiting the consideration of amendments unless they be germane that makes it possible to shut out amendments if they be not germane. This rule provides for the consideration of new legislation, notwithstanding the general rules of the House. A particular rule that would prohibit new legislation is not waived, but all the general rules of the House that would apply to such matters.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from New York think that a tariff bill would be in order under this rule as an amendment to this proposition?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no doubt whatever, if my contention be correct, to be perfectly frank with the gentleman, that any amendment is in order at this point in the bill. I do not wish to weary the Chair by reading the decision to which I have just referred, but in that decision, made by Mr. Speaker Carlisle, he said:

In the absence of an express rule the amendment would not be liable to a point of order upon the ground that it was inconsistent with or not germane to the subject under consideration, for, according to the common parliamentary law of this country and of England, a legislative assembly might by an amendment, in the ordinary form or in the form of a substitute, change the entire character of any bill or other proposition pending.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I would suggest that in order for this rule to have the meaning which the gentleman is seeking to give it, the rule itself would have to contain a provision to this effect, that the Shackleford amendment, per se, and all amendments thereto, shall be in order without regard to the general rules of the House, and it contains nothing of the sort, either in direct terms, or by necessary implication.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; the rule provides for the consideration of the amendment.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of the provision. It does not say the Shackleford amendment.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, we stand on the precise terms of the rule relating to the Shackleford amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And it can not be construed as the gentleman would seem to seek to have it construed, that consideration of a provision means discussion, futile discussion, without any opportunity to amend. The most vital thing about consideration is the opportunity to amend.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will say that we do not gainsay the right of amendment, but the amendments must come within the operation of the general rules of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the general rules of the House do not apply, as the rule specifically provides—

That after the adoption of this rule it shall be in order * * * notwithstanding the general rules of the House.

That must apply to a part of the provision as well as the entire provision itself.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of this rule this provision would have gone out on a point of order, for the reason that new legislation of this character may not be considered on an appropriation bill. The only effect of the rule is to provide that this proposition may be considered on an appropriation bill. It comes before this House to all intents and purposes as an original proposition, and the rule of the House to the effect that no amendment may be in order unless it be germane to that proposition applies. The language of the rule itself is:

That after the adoption of this rule it shall be in order in the consideration of H. R. 21279 * * * to consider the new legislation on said bill hereinafter mentioned notwithstanding the general rules of the House.

What does that mean? Simply that this proposition, this new legislation, which otherwise would not be in order, may be considered. It comes before the House to all intents and purposes as an original proposition, as if the bill itself were pending before the House. Hence when the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] is offered, the question for the Chair to determine is whether or not it is germane to the bill, whether it could have been considered if the original bill, which is set out in this rule, were now under consideration. To my mind, the Sims amendment presents an entirely different proposition from the original proposition presented in the Shackleford bill that we are entitled to consider under the rule, hence is not germane and for that reason not in order.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what was said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], that the special rule which is adopted makes it in order to offer an amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill that would not otherwise be in order to be offered, I desire to say this: Now, then, if an unauthorized amendment is made in order on the Post Office appropriation bill by sweeping aside all the rules of the House, then I want to know what rule is to be invoked when you come to amend that amendment? I think the argument is conclusive. Let us suppose that it is not, and it is only a question of germaneness. Now, what is the object of this bill? First take this bill as reported. The object and purpose of the measure, of course, is gathered from its face and its language, but at the same time we must look at the effect of the bill and see what the intention of the bill is. Why, I do not suppose there is a gentleman in this House who seeks to pay rent for roads already improved with no other purpose in view. I think that is not your object. Your object is to offer rent for roads for use of rural carriers of a certain class with a graded rental, showing clearly on the face of it that the object of the bill is to induce the improvement of roads from a lower to a higher class by offering the higher pay for the higher class, with minimum pay for the lowest class. That is the intent and purpose of this bill, and there is no use in denying that. You have that in view and it is not discreditable at all. It is to induce the people in the counties and communities through which the rural-carrier roads are now in existence with their own means to improve the roads so used below class C as to bring them up to class C and get the rental. There is not a man in this House who will contend for a moment that the object and purpose of this bill is not to induce the further improvement of roads; therefore the real motive and purpose is the improvement of roads that need improvement, to aid in the improvement by the Government of State highways used by a Government functionary—the mail carrier.

Now, the amendment I offer does not contravene, supersede, or set aside any provision of the bill; not one; but in addition to the roads constructed for which rental shall be given it provides that the Postmaster General, with the cooperation and consent of the State and local authorities having charge of such roads, is authorized to improve the roads up to class C, and when they are so improved they will fall under the rental of class C.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is there not a distinct difference between the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee? In other words, is it not a fact that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri provides for renting roads or compensating for their use, while the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee provides for building roads in order to put them in condition to secure advantage of the rental?

Mr. SIMS. Absolutely; the gentleman makes a clear statement.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Then I fail to see how the gentleman's amendment can be germane to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SIMS. Absolutely; the object, purpose, and motive—and we determine the motive by the result—of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri is to improve roads below one grade to a higher grade as an inducement to get a higher rental.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman's amendment, I think, is germane, but does he provide for the United States Government improving those roads by and with the consent of the local authorities having charge of the work of improving the roads? Had not the gentleman's amendment better provide with the consent of the State which has the control of their roads and in whom the title of the public roads rests?

Mr. SIMS. It contemplates having the consent of the controlling authority, whether it be State, county, or municipal. It also provides that. Now, I do not encroach on a particle of that authority. My amendment is that the Federal officers, in conjunction with the State authorities, shall use Federal money collected by Federal taxation to improve the rural routes solely on the ground that they are used for Federal purposes. There is no use in dodging it. The object is the same.

Mr. BUTLER. While my question does not touch upon the question of order, can the gentleman tell me how much it will cost the Federal Government, or has the gentleman considered how much it will cost the Federal Government?

Mr. SIMS. I have not.

Mr. BUTLER. Can the gentleman give an idea what it will cost?

Mr. SIMS. That is not germane to the discussion of this point of order.

Mr. BUTLER. I know it is not.

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think, on the ground of the statement that the whole matter is being considered under a special rule authorizing it and all amendments to it, that the question of germaneness is not subject to a point of order under general parliamentary law.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. LEVER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if under this rule provided by the Rules Committee it would be in order to bring in the naval appropriation bill as an amendment to this proposition?

Mr. SIMS. Now, I do not think the Chair needs any enlightenment that would come from answering such a question.

Mr. HILL. I am clearly of the opinion myself that the amendment is germane, and it seems to me, the subject having been made legal and brought on this bill by the rules, any other ruling would prevent any other amendment whatever on this subject.

I did not rise to merely express that opinion. I did rise to extend to my friend from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] my most profound congratulations, a year after his famous decision during the extra session, when he ruled while it was possible to lower a tariff rate on a pending bill it was not possible, because it was not germane, to transfer it to the free list. I thought that would come up to trouble him and his side in the future, but inasmuch as he has reversed his opposition and nullified the decision of last April I think we ought to take courage from his opinion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the rule provides that it shall be in order to consider the proposition which has been offered as an amendment by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD]. That proposition is now offered as an amendment under the rule. If the rule had not made it in order to offer it, the proposition would be subject to a point of order.

I can not agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that any amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is in order without regard to whether it is germane to the subject matter of the amendment. But what is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD]? It is known as the good-roads proposition. It is a proposition to classify roads in the country and to pay compensation for their use at varying rates; that is, pay compensation for the use of part of them. It divides roads practically into four classes and proposes to pay compensation for the use of three of the classes. Now, it seems to me that it would be perfectly in order as a germane amendment to provide that, instead of paying compensation for the use of a road, we should pay for the repairs on the road. They should authorize the expenditure either directly under an officer of the Government or to pay the money over to county or highway officials to expend on repairs to the road, because that, in reality, is the purpose of the proposition. It is to convey money to people charged with the care of roads by which they will be able to in part maintain the roads in good repair, and if that is the case certainly it would be in order as a germane amendment to provide that we should pay directly for the repair of the roads.

of a road—an amendment to a bill whose purpose is to pay an interrupt him, I will say the amendment against which they raised the point of order does not provide for paying anything. It provides for putting an amendment on this bill for the Government to go out and construct or aid in the construction of a road—as amendment to a bill whose purpose is to pay an annual rental for the use of roads. They are totally unlike propositions.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman now that in my judgment it is clearly germane to say that, instead of paying rent for the use of roads in order that those who receive the rental can repair the roads, we should pay the money directly to them with which to repair the roads, and say so.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. One question there?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. This bill does not provide we pay the money to the county to repair the roads. We just pay it for the use the Government has already had on the day the payment is made. And that is all it does.

Mr. MANN. I understand what the bill provides. The bill does not provide that the money shall be used for the repair of the roads. No man in this House will for a moment justify voting for any proposition of the sort unless he couples with it in his own mind the fact that the money to be paid is to be paid really for keeping the roads in repair.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. On the question of the point of order; certainly.

Mr. LEVER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois, under the general rules of the House would it be in order to offer an amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill saying how the railroad companies should use the money which we pay them for transporting the mails?

Mr. MANN. Under the general rules of the House it would not be in order, because you can not change the law under the general rules of the House by an amendment on an appropriation bill, but that rule of the House is wiped out by the rule that is now before us.

Mr. STERLING. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. As I understand, the money will be paid to township authorities having charge of the road fund?

Mr. MANN. Whoever the officials are who have charge of the roads.

Mr. STERLING. I do not understand that they will be bound to use the money to keep only those roads in repair on which the mail is carried. They can use it for any road purposes in the township, can they not?

Mr. MANN. They can bury it, I suppose. There is nothing in the bill that requires them to use it at all. I suppose their local law will determine how they will use it. The money comes to them. But I say it is perfectly in order for us, when we consider the matter of paying them in one way, to provide for the payment to them in another way, and it is perfectly in order, so far as the question of germaneness is concerned, to say whether we pay it by rent or directly by repairs, because that is all a part of the same subject matter. Now, here is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. It is to take into consideration a fourth class of roads not provided for in the bill, and having provided in the bill that we pay toll or rent for one class, a second class, and a third class, we shall then do something for class four.

Now it is certainly germane to say that if we divide roads in the United States into four classes and provide for the payment of three of them we can add and make payment for the other or fourth class. Having that right we have the right to say whether we will pay the money directly or whether we shall provide that it shall be expended in the way provided by the amendment.

While I do not know whether the amendment ought to prevail, and doubt the desirability of extending the class, still, so far as the question of germaneness is concerned, I do not see how there is any escape from the proposition that the amendment offered is germane to the proposition in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, a word touching the point of order. I have listened to my colleague from Illinois upon this point of order. This special rule, in my judgment, serves one purpose only. It sets aside for the purpose of this amendment the rule of the House which prevents legislation on appropriation bills, and that is its only office.

Suppose this bill were pending as a measure by itself—"Be it enacted," and so forth—suppose that the bill which is covered by the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri were under consideration. It seems to me it would then not be considered for a moment that this amendment would be germane.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Suppose it was under consideration under a rule which provided that it should be considered, the general rules of the House to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. CANNON. What is the use of supposing a case that does not exist?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is what the gentleman did.

Mr. CANNON. Then I did not catch the gentleman's question correctly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I said, Suppose this provision were in the form of a bill and were being considered under a special rule to the effect that it could be considered, the general rules of the House to the contrary notwithstanding, would that mean something?

Mr. CANNON. Clearly not, in my judgment. But that is not this case. The office of this rule is to permit this amendment to be in order upon an appropriation bill, and when this rule was under discussion I recollect that the question was asked, "Would not the only object of the rule be to permit amendments to be offered?" And it was further asked, "Would it be subject to any amendment that is germane?"

Now, as to whether it is germane or not, my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] thinks it is. We are not without plenty of authorities on this subject. I refer the Chair to page 386 of the Manual, about the center of the page:

> Two subjects are not necessarily germane because they are related.

And then a number of cases are given, one almost precisely in point:

> To a bill granting a right of way to a railroad, an amendment providing for the purchase of the railroad by the Government—

Is not germane. Yet the object of granting a right of way to a railroad is to get a railroad. The gentleman says the object of the proposed legislation is to improve roads. Well, that is a matter of argument. The provision speaks for itself, namely, to compensate the civil division in which the road is situated, being a post road and used in the rural mail service, for the use of that road by the Government, not to buy the road.

Oh, but the gentleman says that this provides for classes A, B, and C. Yes; but classes A, B, and C do not cover all the remainder of the roads that are not in the schedule or in those classes, and my friend from Illinois says, "Oh, well, that is true; this is a direction of the General Government to accomplish the same object that it seeks to accomplish by the bill or amendment."

Well, now, that may be true, but it treats of an entirely new class of roads; not to pay rent for their use. They are not being used at all by rural routes; it is an entirely different class of roads.

Mr. SIMS. It is only roads that are used by rural carriers that are covered by the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I was following my colleague from Illinois.

Mr. SIMS. Then he misled you if you followed him. It takes in roads up to class C.

Mr. CANNON. Up to class C?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The object there is to take possession of the road. That renders it not germane—to spend the money of the Government upon the roads. And the case is cited to the Chair where, when a bill was pending to grant a right of way or a franchise to a road, the proposition to buy the road was held to be not germane. And it seems to me the ruling is sound.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to weary the Chair at all, but I wish to call his attention to this situation: The Chair must decide two propositions, and the first is, Will the Chair interpret the special rule broadly or narrowly? I do not believe it was in the mind of the House in the adoption of this rule to bring in here a proposition which would permit any and every kind of a proposition as an amendment to this proposition.

If that were the case, as admitted by the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Tennessee, then we might offer the naval appropriation bill to this section provided by the rule, and it would be in order. We might also offer the steel schedule, the woolen schedule, or any other unrelated matter.

I take it that the Chair is going to construe this rule liberally and carry out the intention of the House, which was to make this legislation in order on an appropriation bill—legislation that would not have been in order except for this special rule. Beyond that, it seems to me, the Chair can not go without construing this rule too narrowly to bring it within the bounds of common sense.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman's position is sustained, would it be possible to enlarge the parcel-post provisions of this bill by offering an amendment for a full parcel post?

Mr. LEVER. Unless the amendment is absolutely germane to the proposition, it can not be considered.

Mr. HILL. Would not such an amendment be germane?

Mr. LEVER. I think it would be.

Mr. HILL. Then why is not this germane here?

Mr. LEVER. For this reason: That the proposition made in order by the Committee on Rules deals with the question of compensation for the use of the roads. The amendment suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] deals with the proposition of constructing roads out of Federal funds, two propositions as antagonistic as day and night, and which can not be germane to each other. Now, if the Chair is to decide this proposition broadly, construing this rule liberally, then the Chair must decide whether the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] is germane to the proposition made in order by the special rule. This amendment proposes to build roads out of Federal funds. The amendment made in order by the Committee on Rules proposes to pay rent for the use of roads, two propositions absolutely inconsistent with and antagonistic to each other. They can not by any process of reasoning be reconciled to each other. The basic ideas upon which they rest are diametrically opposed to each other, the fundamentals in each are in complete conflict with each other, and unless two propositions are closely related I can hardly see how the Chair is to hold them germane to each other.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEVER. I will.

Mr. MANN. The amendment refers only to public roads. Does the gentleman think an amendment to make it apply to private toll roads would be out of order?

Mr. LEVER. I do not, if those toll roads were used by the Federal Government for carrying the mails; but if it was for the purpose of building them it would be out of order, in my judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been ruled time and again that where a paragraph proposing amendments to a general appropriation bill is out of order on that bill, but is allowed to go by without a point of order being made, or if a rule is brought in making in order that which was not before in order, then any amendment which is germane to the proposition is in order. The question which the Chair now has to determine is as to whether this amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] is germane or not. After a careful examination of the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], which proposes to divide the roads over which the mail is carried on rural and star routes into classes, and providing for a compensation to be paid for the carrying of the mail over those roads, to the officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways, the Chair thinks it is very clear that this rent is intended to go to the maintenance and, if those who have control of those funds choose, to the construction of additional roads. Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] proposes to extend that class, and provides that "any part of the same"—that is, roads used by the United States for the purpose of transporting rural mails, in addition to the roads "hereinbefore mentioned and described"—are hereby declared to be post roads; that is, the roads mentioned in the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri. And it then provides a compensation to be paid to the officers having control of these roads provided for in this proposition. And while it does say that the amount appropriated may be used for the construction of roads, yet it also provides for the maintenance of roads to be used as post roads. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the amendment is germane, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to explain that while this amendment is printed in the RECORD with an appropriation of $10,000,000, when I offered the amendment a while ago I struck out the appropriation. Consequently there is no appropriation carried in this amendment, and it is put on all fours with the rest of the amendment. Consequently, if any money is used for the building or improvement of roads, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads will have to provide for it as plainly as it will for the payment of the rental. Not knowing how much was necessary, the $10,000,000 was only a guess. So I thought it was best to strike out the appropriation.

I want to explain this amendment. It is not antagonistic to a single provision of the Shackleford bill, and I can not see how any gentleman can regard it as endangering the passage of the bill. It seems to me it will strengthen it. It is in language which means what it says. It directly authorizes the Postmaster General, by and with the consent and cooperation of the State and local authorities having charge of the maintenance and construction of the roads, to improve roads below class C up to class C. Then those roads will immediately pass into the rental class, and then the amount paid each year would be fixed by the other provisions of the bill. This really strengthens the bill and makes it more defensible, and these roads that are being used by rural carriers, and that must continue to be so used, falling below class C, may be improved by and with the help of the United States Treasury. It is best to do things openly and directly. If we have got no power to use Federal taxes for the improvement of roads directly, we have no power to do it indirectly.

Mr. KENDALL. Has the gentleman's amendment been printed?

Mr. SIMS. No; it was offered a few minutes ago. The very fact that the payment of the rent is made to the authority having charge of the improvement of these roads means of itself that the money is to be used on the roads or other highways in connection with them.

Mr. BARNHART. Does the gentleman believe it would be right for the people of one section of the country to put their roads in such condition that they are in either class A, class B, or class C, by their own energy and taxation, and then the Government give to some other section of the country the help that will put its roads in the same condition?

Mr. SIMS. Those roads you refer to are already in that class.

Mr. BARNHART. They made them so.

Mr. SIMS. There are thousands of miles of roads being used for rural carriers which with the addition of either a parcel post or a postal express will have an additional Government service to perform, and the roads below class C that are so used are entitled to be made efficient for the use that will be made of them in the future under additional legislation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. If I understand the gentleman's position correctly, it is that the amendment as it now stands does not directly provide that there shall be any additional good roads constructed?

Mr. SIMS. No; or at least it is not mandatory.

Mr. MANN. That we just pay rent for the use of roads in order that we may deliver mail to the people?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And if they do not want it goodness knows we will be willing to quit. But the gentleman proposes to expend money so that there may be some additional good roads provided in the country where there are no good roads now.

Mr. SIMS. That is exactly the object of my amendment.

Mr. MANN. That will enable us to carry mail more cheaply than it is carried now.

Mr. SIMS. That is it exactly.

Mr. MANN. While the other provision does not add a dollar of benefit in that direction.

Mr. SIMS. As I said before, that on any of the roads provided for in the bill the service can be performed that is now required, or that any additional legislation may require, without further improvement, but there are thousands of miles of roads in communities that are not able to bring their roads up to where they come within the rental classes, and this is intended to bring that about.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to hear this amendment read, and I ask to have it reread.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman if his measure proposes that all of the roads below class C, and not included in the three classes, shall be improved to the same extent as roads in the three classes?

Mr. SIMS. No; not all roads under class C. Only roads used by rural carriers.

Mr. KINDRED. That those in class C and below class C shall be improved to the same extent as class A and class B.

Mr. SIMS. In reply I will state this, that the amendment will authorize the Postmaster General, in cooperation with the State or local authorities having charge of such roads, to improve any road now or afterwards used for Federal purposes, just as though it was in the three classes—to be improved up to where it will come within class C; that then the rent will apply, and the improvement provision will no further apply.

Mr. KINDRED. Does the gentleman propose that, without reference to what the State or county authorities may do, with reference to the roads falling under class C?

Mr. SIMS. Absolutely, because the Government of the United States builds post offices without reference to what the local authorities do. Who ever heard of the Government of the United States paying rent on a brick house for a post office, which house had ample facilities for doing the business required, and then saying to the owner, "If you will build a brown-stone house we will increase the rent, or if you will build a marble house we will still further increase the rent," as an encouragement to build good houses, without any regard for the necessity of a better building in which to discharge the duties imposed.

Mr. KINDRED. Just one more question. Does the gentleman's proposal of improving any class depend to any extent upon what the State or county authorities may do?

Mr. SIMS. None whatever; absolutely none to bring it up to class C; that is, I mean roads used for rural-mail purposes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman pardon my curiosity, but I have a question I would like to ask. It has not been talked about, and it would be very interesting to me, whether or not it interests others, to know just what this is likely to cost the Government. My friend is a calculator, and I know him well, and I know that he reasons well and thinks well. Can the gentleman give us a reasonable idea of how much this will likely cost the Government?

Mr. SIMS. That will entirely depend on how long it takes to improve the roads needing it and how many of them are used as rural routes which are now below class C. I can not tell the gentleman, nor could anyone else, unless he knows every mile of road and the condition of it, because one mile of road may cost double what another mile of road will on the same route; the roads in one county may cost double what the roads of another county will cost, and so with the States; and so it is impossible to tell exactly what either of these provisions will cost the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. Has the gentleman any idea where we will get money to carry out these provisions?

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I understand the purpose of the gentleman who drew the Shackleford amendment to be to draw it in such a way that States would absolutely retain control of these roads. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted, will not that turn over to the Federal Government control of all the roads used by the Government in transporting these mails?

Mr. SIMS. Absolutely not.

Mr. HAMLIN. But the gentleman's amendment states they shall be declared to be post roads.

Mr. SIMS. They have to be post roads in order for the Federal Government to have constitutional warrant to pay for the improvement or rent of any of them.

Mr. HAMLIN. And you would have to do it in order to build them; but that is not the purpose of this amendment.

Mr. SIMS. The purpose of the rent is not to build. I want to say this, that I do not believe we have power under the Constitution to appropriate money out of the Federal Treasury for a local State purpose not in any way connected with a national duty or a national requirement; but the rural route being in my judgment by its use is a post road, therefore the Government does have power, either directly or indirectly, to improve it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] whether your bill did not make post roads, it is now the law and has been since 1866. Every public road or highway in the States over which mail is carried; every canal, every river, and every street of the cities in the United States over which mail is carried, is considered to be a post road of the United States.

Mr. SIMS. I accept the statement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]. That part of my amendment is mere surplusage. What I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri is this: Because the United States Government performs the Federal function over a road it is not necessary to place that road under Federal control, because the Government has no power to do anything on those roads except as Congress may authorize it, and Congress not having given the Postmaster General or any other Federal authority the right to control these roads, but only the right, with the cooperation and consent of the local authorities charged with the improvement, to aid in the work, Federal control does not follow.

I want to call my friend's attention to this, namely, that we have rural routes now with rural mail boxes all over the country. The boxes are furnished by the patrons at their own cost, and yet Congress has made it a criminal offense for anybody to damage or destroy one of those boxes. But that does not give the Government control of the boxes; it makes it an offense to interfere with the Federal use of them.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. How much is the expense that would be involved in your amendment?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know. I can not tell anything about it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Your amendment does not limit the expenditure to $10, $20, or $25 a mile as does the Shackleford amendment? Do you mean to say your amendment authorizes the Postmaster General to contract for any sum necessary in order to construct post roads?

Mr. SIMS. I say that under such rules and regulations as he may establish by and with the consent of the local authorities. I am not supposing it will cost any great sum to take a road used by rural carriers and bring it up from its present condition to class C.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. You understand there is an absolute expenditure fixed in the Shackleford bill. You might go out in my country and find a road you could not improve for $100,000 a mile.

Mr. SIMS. That the carriers are going over now and discharging the duties of rural carriers at this time?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes, sir; mountain trails.

Mr. SIMS. And you have got roads in Colorado that are used by rural carriers that would cost $100,000 a mile to improve?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the committee to certain features of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. It is at war with the whole theory upon which the roads bill is constructed. [Applause.] If this amendment had been drawn for the purpose of killing this bill, it could not have been more speciously and effectively constructed for that purpose. [Applause.] If it is added to the bill, I venture to say that there will hardly be a Member of this House, unless perhaps the patron of the amendment, who will vote for the measure in the amended form. Permit me to present to this body the reasons why I make a statement so broad as the above. The theory of the Shackleford bill is that the communities which help themselves, shall be helped. [Applause.] The theory of the Sims amendment is to help the communities that do not, and will not help themselves, and the extent of their failure to help themselves will mark the measure of the Government's aid. Under the Sims amendment all that will be necessary for any community to do, will be to fail to work its roads at all, and the Government will then come forward to work them. [Applause.]

Under the provisions of the Sims amendment, mark you, no payment will be made for those roads that are now up to standard or that will be made to standard by the local authorities. No inducement is offered, or obligation imposed upon the States or the localities to maintain the roads to standard. Under the amendment all the roads that are now below the standard, and that will be allowed to continue in that condition by the local authorities, or the States, will be taken over by the United States, and worked. The Shackleford amendment is a bill of limited liability. It is easy to figure out the maximum liability under that amendment. The Sims amendment, gravely proposed, and doubtless in good faith, is a proposition of unlimited expenditure on the part of the Federal Government. Yet the gentleman asks an economical House to vote for such a proposition. Under the Shackleford amendment, if every road that potentially comes within the operation of this bill were to receive the amount contemplated by it, the expenditure could not be over $19,000,000 in the first year. Under the Sims proposition, should the States and local communities simply decline to perform their proper functions, the conceivable expenditure for repair of roads might be $190,000,000 a year. Yet our friend argues that his proposition is superior in merit to the Shackleford proposition.

Permit me to call the attention of this committee to another feature of the Sims amendment. The opposition to national aid to roads may be divided into two classes. The first class is composed of Members who believe that the National Government ought not to aid at all, or in any wise in the maintenance of State roads. That objection is fundamental, and no bill for national aid could be drawn so as to overcome it. The other class is composed of Members who object to any form of national aid, carrying Federal interference with or control over State functions. The latter objection can be met, and has been met, by this bill. Even the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has found no ground for criticism of the pending proposition on that score. Indeed his amendment providing for Federal construction of post roads, is an admission in substance that the pending proposition does not err in that direction. The real friends of the bill are opposed to Federal control of State roads, and are therefore opposed to the Sims amendment. Permit me to call the attention of this body to a feature of that amendment, which if grafted on our roads bill will of necessity cause the Federal Government to take over the maintenance of all post roads, to the exclusion of the States, a policy to which I am unalterably opposed, however much it may commend itself to our friend from Tennessee.

The amendment provides that the contract for road construction shall be made by the representatives of the Federal Government with the consent of the State, or local authorities. If the State authorities do not agree to this contract, the Federal Government assumes no burden, or obligation, and no work of maintenance, or repair is carried on, but the moment the State agrees to the arrangements, the work will be prosecuted under Federal supervision, Federal direction, and Federal control. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia that he have five minutes additional? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Now permit me to call attention to the practicality, the feasibility, and the common sense of the proposed measure. We know what that bill will require, to a very accurate degree. We know the mileage of post roads in the United States. We know the mileage of improved roads, and the mileage of dirt roads.

We know the appropriate rental that will be paid for the roads in each class. We know, that unless the States and localities maintain the roads to the standard required, not a dollar will be paid out of the Federal Treasury. Some gentlemen have asked what the Shackleford bill will cost. At the present scale of payments, it can not possibly carry, as I have said, more than $19,000,000 in its first year of operation. As a matter of fact not half of that will be required. If hereafter the Government, that is the Congress of the United States, chooses to raise the rental for the roads in the respective classes, to the extent of that increase, this policy will carry an increased expenditure. In the progress of time, apart from any increase of rentals, the inevitable development of our rural routes, and the improvement of our roads, will call for a larger appropriation. But this is a legitimate and natural evolution. The theory of this bill contemplates that in proportion as the business of the rural mails, requiring additional routes increases, our expenditures upon this form of national improvement, will inevitably increase. Is there any objection to the moderate expenditure contemplated by this bill, safeguarded as it is by the provisions which limit its application to the roads that are maintained to the prescribed standard? [Applause.] I reaffirm, Mr. Chairman, what I said in the beginning of my remarks that every real friend of this measure, the men who have helped to cast it in its present form, the men who believe in State rights, the men who believe in retaining local jurisdiction, the men who believe in aiding the communities that aid themselves, the men who believe in going forward, the men who believe in affording a stimulus to local endeavor, these men, one and all, ought to vote against this pernicious and destructive amendment offered on the part of the gentleman from Tennessee. [Applause.]

Mr. FAISON. Mr. Chairman, I heard the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] and other equally able gentlemen on last Friday make convincing arguments in favor of the constitutionality of Government aid in construction of public roads, which established beyond doubt that the Constitution would allow the construction and maintenance of State post roads. I shall support, therefore, the Sims amendment with a great deal of pleasure. I shall also support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] with equally as much pleasure, because I see, as the Chair has just ruled, no conflict whatever between the purposes of these two amendments, and I believe that the Democratic Party in its last convention intended what it wrote in its national platform at Denver in 1908.

That platform reads as follows:

We favor Federal aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads.

I think that it wrote into that platform what it meant. I think and believe, and the people think and believe, that when that Democratic Party gathered at Denver, Colo., and made its national platform that it meant what it said. I shall support this bill, not only for the maintenance of post roads, as in the Shackleford bill, but for the construction of post roads as required in the Sims amendment, which is even more necessary, as roads must be constructed first then afterwards maintained—and why not as well by national aid? I would hate to believe that the Republican Party intended to deceive its people and supporters.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The Sims amendment does not propose to construct the roads, but simply proposes to take over, on the part of the Federal Government, the maintenance of your State roads.

Mr. FAISON. I think it does mean the construction of post roads, as the language is too plain and clear to be doubtful.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It does not.

Mr. FAISON. I repeat, I would hate to believe that the Republican Party wrote into its platform at its last Chicago convention, in 1908, anything which would tend to deceive the American people, and I would like to read here what that platform also states. The other day in discussing post roads a gentleman from the Republican side of the House, Mr. MADDEN, of Illinois, and another gentleman, Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL, of New York, declared that Government aid to post roads was nothing less than socialism. Their Republican national platform of 1908 contains the following language, simple and plain, for the farmers especial consideration and comfort and vote, which these gentlemen seem to have forgotten and denounce as socialism now.

THE FARMER.

Among those whose welfare is as vital to the welfare of the whole country as is that of the wageworker is the American farmer. The prosperity of the country rests peculiarly upon the prosperity of agriculture. The Republican Party during the last 12 years has accomplished extraordinary work in bringing the resources of the National Government to the aid of the farmer, not only in advancing agriculture itself, but in increasing the conveniences of rural life. Free rural mail delivery has been established. It now reaches millions of our citizens, and we favor its extension until every community in the land receives the full benefit of the postal service. We recognize the social and economic advantage of good country roads, maintained more or less largely at public expense and less and less at the expense of the abutting property owner.

This is a direct, plain, and honest statement in the Republican national platform, demanding national aid to country roads "at public expense, and less and less at the expense of the abutting property owners" to those roads. Yet it is denounced by members of that party as nothing less than socialism. Are the gentlemen ready to admit that they are Socialists pure and simple, or denounce their own creed and platform upon which they won this farmer vote they pretend to love so much?

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman find any authority for this proposition in the Republican platform?

Mr. FAISON. Yes; I am reading from the Republican national platform of 1908, written at the Chicago convention. Does the gentleman disown his own party platform on the floor of the House and deny its plain language?

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman does not find a word in favor of this proposition in the Republican platform.

Mr. FAISON. That is not a matter for you to interpret, sir. I am reading from the National Republican platform of 1908, and if the Republican Party is honest and means what it says to the farmer, it means just what is written in this platform, and can mean nothing else. But I am not surprised that the gentleman from New York does not recognize his own platform now, after the election. It is the usual habit of his party after election and will create no great surprise.

Mr. PAYNE. It says nothing of the kind.

Mr. FAISON. The Democratic Party platform stands for the construction and maintenance of post roads; the Democratic Members should vote for Mr. SIMS's, as well as Mr. SHACKLEFORD's, amendment. We have heard argument after argument from able gentlemen on this side that such building of roads by national aid is constitutional. The Democratic and Republican platforms demand it, and all the American people expect us to fulfill our party platforms, and I gladly do so in behalf of the great country people whom I have the honor to represent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FAISON. I would like to have unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FAISON. I wish to say furthermore that I shall support the Sims amendment and the Shackleford amendment with pleasure, because I am always glad to vote for the farmers' interest, to add to their pleasure and comfort and to give them every convenience enjoyed by the city and town people, also to make less burdensome the daily life of that large and useful army of rural mail carriers, who so faithfully, through rain and sunshine, serve the mails in the rural districts. I hold in my hand a telegram from Mr. E. D. Pearsall, of North Carolina, for years the secretary of the North Carolina Letter Carriers' Association, asking my support of the Sims amendment in behalf of the letter carriers of the State and their farmer patrons of the country roads—"dirt-road statesmen," if you on the other side so please to call them:

Hon. JOHN M. FAISON,
Washington, D. C.:

Representing 1,200 rural letter carriers and millions of farmers—our patrons—we ask you to support Sims bill for post roads appropriations now pending.

E. D. PEARSALL.

ROCKY POINT, N. C., April 28, 1912.

Our Republican friends on that side must admit, though they may deny it, that national aid along various lines has been an established Government policy for years. The following tabulated statement shows our national appropriations for improvements of all kinds except for good roads at our doors. Either discontinue them or divide them for good roads at home, as well as abroad.

The Government has given in land grants to railroads 200,000,000 acres, worth, if now owned by the Government, about $20 to $30 per acre.

Appropriations for rivers and harbors since 1875	$592,395,160
Appropriations for Mississippi River levees to June 30, 1902	16,580,614
Appropriations for public buildings to June 30, 1911	188,000,000
Land-grant funds to State agricultural colleges	24,585,997

Appropriations for State colleges of agriculture, 1890–1910	$16,786,000
Appropriations for Panama Canal (estimated)	400,000,000
Appropriations for road building in Porto Rico	2,000,000
Appropriations for road building in Philippines	3,000,000
Appropriations for road building in Canal Zone	1,495,000
Appropriations for road building in Alaska	1,925,000
Appropriations for road building in United States during the last 60 years	000,000,000

This writer, in discussing this table, further states:

It is evident from the foregoing table that the National Government has extended generous aid by direct appropriations and land grants for the promotion of education, and that it has aided to the utmost degree in the development of transportation facilities, the public alone excepted, and even in the matter of road improvement it has voted millions of dollars for the construction of roads in the Philippines, Porto Rico, Canal Zone, and Alaska. It has encouraged the reclamation of arid lands by providing legislation under which great irrigation projects are completed and their cost defrayed out of the proceeds from the sale of public lands thus reclaimed. Congress now stands ready to advance to the Reclamation Service $20,000,000 for the purpose of carrying on its work whenever it shall seem necessary. The National Government in its beneficent concern for the protection of the dwellers along the Mississippi River has voted many millions of dollars for the building and maintenance of levees. The Rural Delivery Service now carries its annual appropriation of over $40,000,000, and represents one of the few benefits which the farmer received out of the lavish disbursements of billion-dollar Congresses. The Rural Delivery Service is hampered and curtailed by reason of bad roads which add millions of dollars to the cost of its operation. It is evident from a study of the appropriation bills passed by Congress and the general trend of legislation, including the tariff measures and the patent laws, that our Government has been exceedingly active in fostering and developing manufacturing, transportation, education, colonial development; in short, we find in all the records of governmental activities the one glaring evidence of neglect, and that is in the treatment of the public roads. In fact, agriculture has been given less real assistance by our national legislators than any other line of human endeavor.

The time has come when conditions are so serious as to demand remedial action by Congress, and it is hard to see how national aid to road improvement can longer be withheld.

If we can dig canals, improve harbors, and dredge rivers, and then subsidize boats to carry the mails at home and abroad; if we can give railroad companies large quantities of public lands as a bonus for building railroads, and then subsidize them to carry the mails, why can we not also help to construct and maintain post roads for carrying mail to the farmers of the country? Are the farmers of so little importance to our country as to be always the less-favored class of our citizens, to be satisfied only with party platform promises, now denied by leading Republicans [Mr. PAYNE], or denounced as Socialists by others for demanding only what has been given to others and denied them for years by the Republican Party?

As a Representative of North Carolina, I am not asking charity nor seeking alms at the hands of the National Treasury in supporting these bills for the construction and maintenance of post roads in my State. The annual report of the United States Treasury for the year 1911 shows a balance of nearly $6,000,000 to the credit of our State, and how better can these funds be used? It is, indeed, time that the State should be treated with more justice at the hands of the United States Government by a fair and just expenditure of its revenues, to say nothing of the burdensome high tariff taxes paid largely by the farmers of this country, who never share in its benefits.

A statement furnished Senator OVERMAN by the United States Treasury Department as to the amount of revenue paid the Government by North Carolina and the amount received by it for the year 1911 shows that the receipts from customs, internal revenue, and corporation tax—paid by North Carolina—and miscellaneous receipts—not classified—amounted to $7,316,977.18, while the disbursements made by the Federal Government for North Carolina—public buildings, customs service, Internal-Revenue Service, Life-Saving Service, Revenue-Cutter Service, Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, assay office, rivers and harbors—amounted to $1,354,100.58. [Applause.]

The amount paid by North Carolina to the Federal Government for the fiscal year 1911, as shown by these figures, exceeded the amount of revenue received by North Carolina from the Federal Government $5,962,876.60.

The State of North Carolina, then, has the right to demand more than it now receives and to demand this as a matter of justice. It should have ample appropriations for its rivers, harbors, and canals. It is entitled to funds for needed public buildings, and then there will be left some millions of dollars, a part of which can not be more judiciously and wisely spent than in the construction and maintenance of post roads. [Applause.]

Good post roads will cheapen the cost of the mail service, make the parcel-post mail service practicable and efficient, cheapen the high cost of transportation from farm to factory and from factory to farm, cheapen the high cost of living in towns and cities, add convenience and pleasure to farm life, and do more than any other one legislation to bring peace, plenty, and prosperity to the great American people. It is constitutional, the party platforms of both the Democratic and Republican Parties, and justly demanded by all the people of every section of our common country who will not suffer denial longer. [Applause.]

Those who deny them and their country such beneficent legislation will meet just condemnation in due time for failure to keep their party pledges to the long-suffering, tax-ridden people who pay for these large appropriations and receive not their own share at home in good roads. We should either share with them or stop such large appropriations elsewhere.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the House for a moment, I desire to say that I do not believe there is a man, woman, or child in the United States who is not in favor of good roads.

This whole question revolves around the sincerity of the Democratic Party as to its protestations, made for almost a hundred years, that indirect taxation is the most expensive kind of taxation to the American people. [Applause.]

Not only myself, but all of my Democratic colleagues, have declared that every dollar covered into the Federal Treasury by means of tariff taxation costs the people of this country about $5, in round figures, which must be paid by them.

This whole question revolves, as I say, around a question of sincerity. We know that if the county or the State issues its bonds upon a system of direct taxes, it levies its taxes in proportion to the wealth of the taxpayer, which burdens a man in proportion to his ability to bear the burden. The question now is as to whether we shall tax the citizen by the circuitous route of tariff taxation on what he eats and what he wears.

I can understand the consistency of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] when he advocates this bill, because he believes taxation by tariff is a blessing to the people. But when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY] advocates it, I am astounded, because I heard him say, less than a month ago, that under these various systems of tariff taxation a common section hand paid as much taxes as Mr. John D. Rockefeller, with his $600,000,000 capital and his $20,000,000 of annual income. I stand amazed at the gentleman who advocates the national building of roads in contradistinction from the county and State building, who would levy for this purpose as much tax upon the section hand as he does upon the six hundred millions of John D. Rockefeller.

Let me tell you, the Democratic Party is either sincere or insincere. It either means what it says or it does not mean what it says. If it is sincere in the declaration that this system of taxation is the most burdensome in the world, that the Government gets only one dollar into the Treasury for every five which the tariff puts into the coffers of the manufacturers of the country, then it is more than hypocrisy for us to shift this burden from the local and State taxpayers, who pay in proportion to their wealth, over to the taxpayers under the Federal Government, where its revenues are derived by tariff taxation from those who pay in proportion to their wants.

Take the illustration given by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY]. Here is Mr. Rockefeller, and here is your section hand, and they are to be taxed for good roads. Mr. Rockefeller pays less for good roads than does the section hand, who gets only $1.25 a day. It is horrible and monstrous to say that the man who earns only $1.25 a day by the sweat of his face should pay as much as John D. Rockefeller, with his $600,000,000. Yet you are about to adopt a system of taxation that incorporates in its terms that monstrosity, denunciation of which almost every Democrat applauded when the gentleman from Iowa gave voice to the sentiment.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. DIES. I suppose so.

Mr. FOWLER. I ask the gentleman from Texas if he thinks, because there is a taxation upon the poor which is unjust, that the American people are not able to change that policy of taxation and at the same time help to build good roads throughout the country?

Mr. DIES. I will give the gentleman a good answer and not a hypocritical one. When we wanted to put wool on the free list, to warm the shivering bodies of the people of this country, our Democratic leader [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said we could not do it because we must have the revenue raised by the tariff on wool. [Applause.] Now, when you want to spend many more millions of dollars, you say you would rather spend the money in proportion to want than in proportion to wealth. I say it is hypocrisy, whether it is pronounced by the Democratic Party or some other party in this country.

Mr. FOWLER. Do you think the Democratic Party was sincere at Denver when it declared for national aid to public highways?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. DIES. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIES. I think the Democratic Party has been sincere for 50 years in its declarations that it wanted a revenue tariff and an economical administration of the Government. Will any intelligent man tell the folks at home how you can constantly increase the expenditures of this Government, constantly add to the avenues of appropriation of the Federal Government, and at the same time reduce the tariff? We had as well be honest with the people and tell them, "You can not have your cake and eat it too." [Applause.] You can not have a low tariff tax and constantly add to your budget of Federal expenditures.

Mr. FOWLER. May I ask one more question?

Mr. DIES. No; I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FOWLER. Just one more question.

Mr. DIES. Make it brief.

Mr. FOWLER. Does not the gentleman think the Republican Party was sincere at Chicago when it declared in favor of good roads in America?

Mr. DIES. I think the Republican Party is sincere when they say that a tariff tax is a blessing. And if it is a blessing this bill is defensible, but if a tariff tax is a curse this bill is not justifiable. If the tariff is a tax, that only gives to the Government one dollar out of every six that it collects, and taxes men in proportion to their necessities instead of in proportion to their wealth and ability to bear it; this bill is utterly undemocratic and utterly indefensible, because you have got county and State systems by which you can raise revenues to build your roads and tax men in proportion to their ability to pay. You deliberately set aside a system that makes a millionaire pay on his millions and makes the man of small means pay small in proportion. You deliberately set that system aside to take up the Republican system of taxing a man in proportion to his needs, on the clothes he wears, on the food he eats, and, as Mr. PROUTY, of Iowa, has said, taxing a section hand as much as John D. Rockefeller. So surely as there is any sincerity in Democracy, so surely as there is a word of truth in all our protestations, we never can reduce the burdens of the people's taxes by lowering those taxes unless we quit being more greedy than the greediest Republican in trying to get appropriations for every conceivable scheme. [Applause.]

I want to say, measuring my words when I say it, that Democracy has almost surrendered its tariff position; has almost given away its position on the tariff question by wanting more money for public buildings, more money for internal improvements; and now this last straw that is to break the camel's back of our sincerity is that the Federal Government should tax want instead of wealth; should extend this Republican system of indirect taxation and take in the roads and make a network of political activity in this country for our benefit and for the benefit of our successors in office. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] should be supported with great enthusiasm by all the true and loyal Representatives of rural constituencies. The measure fathered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] and proposed under the special rule was altogether too restricted and hobble-skirted to be worth while. Your rural constituents asked you for bread and you offered them a stone, merely a Federal appropriation of from $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 annually for rural roads. Is that worth while, when we are tapping the unfailing fountain of the Federal Treasury in the interest of our continuation in this honorable body? How could we justify ourselves as Representatives of rural constituencies when we grant to the rich suburbanite living near the city or the village rent for the road past his house and deny any relief whatever to the dweller at the end of the route in Hickory Hollow or Hazelbush Dell? Is it not our duty in extending the strong and unfailing stream of the Federal Treasury, which flows with milk and honey and good hard cash—can we justify ourselves if in so doing we do not benefit those who most need it, those who can not build their roads themselves? Shall we build roads or aid roads running through thickly settled populations adjacent to the towns and not build roads among our real country people at the end of the route, where the road is likely to be so poor that it does not come within either of the three classes provided for in the bill?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MONDELL. I shall be glad to.

Mr. GARRETT. I appreciate and sympathize——

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no sympathy. Rather mingle in our joy that at last we have an appropriation that really means something.

Mr. GARRETT. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he signed the request to the Committee on Rules bringing in this rule in the same spirit in which he is now speaking?

Mr. MONDELL. Just about the same spirit. The fact is that my friend from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] was looking discouraged that day.

Mr. RUBEY. Just one question.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield.

Mr. RUBEY. Just one single question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MONDELL. I have but half a minute more, and in that time I want to call attention to what a glorious prospect we now have spread before us, the opportunity of appropriating not a paltry ten or twenty or thirty or forty or fifty millions but hundreds of millions of dollars for the benefit of the real people, the farmers at the end of the rural routes. The gentleman from Colorado made a rather foolish inquiry, it seems to me, as to how much could be expended under this appropriation for any given mile of road. Why inquire as to such miserable little details as that [laughter] when you have the unfailing source of the Federal Treasury to draw on? The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] wants to know where the money is to come from and suggests that we can not put everything on the free list and still build thousands and millions of miles of good roads. Of course we can not, but gentlemen are not to be halted in this beautiful program by anything of that sort. The hope of the gentlemen on the other side is that their constituents will never put the two things together, but that after they get home they will hail them as faithful in the reduction of Federal taxation and as even more faithful in passing out to them millions from the Federal Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] rather amuses me. He reminds me of the old doctor in our community who knows nothing about anything except fits, and whenever he gets a patient he first throws him into fits and then he cures the fits. One would be disposed to think that the gentleman from Texas could not make a speech on anything except the tariff, and I would have been inclined to believe that myself had it not been for the fact that I did hear him make an able speech upon the Great Commoner. [Laughter.]

The least acute man in this assembly can discern the fact that this question has nothing to do with the manner or method of raising revenue. I care not whether you get the revenue under your excise tax, your direct method, under your tariff for revenue only, or your tariff for protection. That is a question that we ought not here to discuss, and I shall not allow myself to be diverted to such discussion. The only question here is, after the money has been obtained and is in the Public Treasury by these various methods, where and how, in equity, ought it to be expended?

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. Certainly.

Mr. DIES. How does the gentleman propose to get the money to contribute for this good-roads proposition?

Mr. PROUTY. In the various ways that you will get it for the purpose of building post offices in Texas.

Mr. DIES. Is not that the indirect system of tariff taxation?

Mr. PROUTY. Of course it is; and you are using it and you are declaring, if the gentleman wishes to force this into politics, that you are in favor of a tariff for revenue. I have not said that I was. I supported your excise bill, and I did it because I believed in it, for I believe it is perfectly fair to collect money for all expenditures with some relation to the ability of the man to pay; but we have not that system now. I am in favor of using the money that we collect even by this indirect method in a way that is fair to the people who pay it.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes.

Mr. DIES. Taking the gentleman's illustration with the excise bill, would the section man pay more under a system of State and county direct taxation to good roads or under this indirect system of tariff taxation?

Mr. PROUTY. He would pay just in the same proportion that he pays to obliterate the boll weevil in the gentleman's State now. A man who does not comprehend that can not understand the economics of our country.

Mr. DIES. And the gentleman thinks that is an answer to my question?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes, I do; and if the gentleman does not understand it I can not help it. Here is the proposition in a nutshell. Whatever money goes into the Public Treasury ought to be expended fairly among and for the people who contributed it. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has offered an amendment here to this measure that is unjust and unfair. It will enable a community to say, "We will not spend any of our own money for the purpose of improving roads; we will not do a thing; we will let the Federal Government do that." Here is a community that expends its money for building its own roads, and at the same time the Government does not pay them anything for the building of those roads. Any man who can not comprehend the unfairness of that scheme I do not care to talk to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill by striking out of the amendment, page 3, line 5, the word "rural."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3 of the Shackleford bill, line 5, strike out the word "rural."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to speak for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may be allowed to speak for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen who designate themselves as statesmen of the mud roads, in nearly every instance, represent constituencies of not only farmers but of people living in villages and cities. There is no district in this country that does not contain within its borders some village or some city, and I ask those men who are warbling in the name of the mud lark, in the name of the farmer, whether they propose to represent all of their constituents or only 50 per cent of them. This amendment which I have just proposed gives to every community an equal distribution of the funds that are paid out of the Federal Treasury. My friend from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY] just a moment ago said that he believed in an equal distribution of the Federal funds. If he does he will vote for this amendment, because this amendment proposes that men who live in municipalities as well as those who live on farms shall participate in the improvements that are to be made as a result of the expenditures proposed under this bill. I want to ask you gentlemen who represent rural communities whether you want to go back to your people and say that you are in favor of spending money out of the Federal Treasury for the purpose of maintaining roads throughout the rural districts and against the payment of money out of the Federal Treasury for the purpose of maintaining roads in the villages and cities of your district. You will have an opportunity here by this amendment to say by your vote whether you are really a representative of your district or whether you simply represent that part of your district in which the farmer lives. The men who live in the villages and cities of the United States are equally entitled to the consideration which this bill proposes along with the farmer. Is there any reason why the post roads running through a town or village or city should be discriminated against?

Is there any reason why these eight, ten, fifteen, twenty, or fifty million dollars proposed to be expended on public highways should be paid wholly to the farmer? Is there any reason why the city dweller, who has an equal vote with the farmer, should not have equal rights and equal treatment under this bill? I ask you men who come from country sections of the Nation, Are you willing to go back home and say to the men who live in the villages and the cities that we do not recognize them as any part of our constituency? Are you willing to go back home and have them say to you, How did you deport yourself on the question of the payment of money taken out of the Federal Treasury for the rent of the highways of the Nation? Why were we discriminated against when you were voting for this bill?

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BATHRICK. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not know that the people in the cities use the country roads a great deal?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes; and the people in the country use the city roads as well, and they are glad to have an opportunity to come to the city occasionally and get that communion of interest which that association with the city people gives them.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I do.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if it is not true that the mail is distributed over the rural routes absolutely for the convenience and use of the post office and not the people, and therefore the post office ought to pay for it?

Mr. MADDEN. I assume that the gentlemen who come here favoring the enactment of this legislation believe—because they would not act as they do unless they did believe—that the mail distributed to the rural constituency is simply done as a matter of accommodation to the Government or to the post office authorities. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that any dollar of the public money should be paid out of the Federal Treasury for the upbuilding of any road now in the United States, I am frank to say.

I do not believe that any Federal money should be paid to aid the States in the construction of highways. The States of the Union are amply able to build their roads for themselves. The people who live in those States are patriotic, they are willing to pay their taxes, they have paid them in most of the Northern States of the land, and their roads are being constructed and will continue to be constructed out of the pockets of the local taxpayers.

Mr. PROUTY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. I do.

Mr. PROUTY. I live in a town of 100,000 people—Des Moines. In the last six years there has been about $3,000,000 of public funds expended in my town, and, so far as I know, not a dollar expended for the benefit of the rest of my constituency. Do you not think it is fair that some of it should go to some of my other fellows? [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. I am in favor of every citizen of the United States being treated alike, whether he lives in the city of Des Moines or any other city of equal population. I believe the farmer to be as good as the city dweller, but I do not concede that the city dweller is not equally as good as the farmer.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LANGLEY. I believe the gentleman's amendment, if adopted, would increase the amount——

Mr. MADDEN. The amendment I offer would increase the delivery of the United States mail.

Mr. LANGLEY. It would increase the amount of money?

Mr. MADDEN. It treats of the mails as a whole and not any part of them. It treats of the delivery of mails to every man, woman, and child within the borders of the American Continent. And it does not seek to limit the delivery to any particular section of the country or to any particular class.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman is opposed to any appropriation of this kind, he says?

Mr. MADDEN. I am opposed, in the first instance, to any appropriation of this kind, but if the appropriation is to be made, I am in favor of making it so that it will apply alike to every man, woman, and child in the country.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman evidently does not want his amendment adopted.

Mr. MADDEN. I want the amendment adopted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, while I doubt the advisability and propriety of the General Government entering upon aid to roads throughout the country, I recognize the fact that probably the time has come when the National Government will be required in some form or other, out of the Federal Treasury, to aid in the construction or maintenance of such roads. [Applause.] The amount that would be involved by the Shackleford bill has been estimated by the gentlemen favorable to it at from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000. Whatever that amount may be it does not make very much difference, because it is inevitable that if we enter upon the program we will carry it through until the expenses amount to probably hundreds of millions of dollars; and yet I remember that during my short term of service in this House I have seen the appropriations of the General Government increase fully 100 per cent, and go up to a billion dollars in a year, where only a few years ago it was an unfavorable criticism when Congress appropriated a billion dollars in two years; and I do not doubt that in the end, if it becomes necessary, there will be ways found, fair in the main, by which the money can be raised, nor do I doubt that the money, if expended, will be expended under provisions which in the main provide for very equitable distribution and very fair disposition, for to doubt that would be to doubt the qualities of our race for self-government. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this is the first time, I think, in my service in this House when a proposition is presented purely in the interest of one class of people as against another. If we are to enter upon the policy of giving aid to roads, why should there be the distinction between the country roads and city roads. Nearly or quite half the population of the country live in the cities. They pay their equal share of taxes. They are much more thickly populated per mile of street or road than is the country. On what basis can it be justly claimed that you should tax the people in the cities for the construction of good roads and make no provision equal in terms for the city roads? If we should pay $15, $20, or $25 a mile for the use of the country road which is improved, then, by every right and in justice, we should pay something to encourage the cities to improve their streets and keep them in repair.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. POWERS. This Shackleford amendment provides——

Mr. MANN. I know what it provides. Just ask the question.

Mr. POWERS. If you will just wait a minute, and let me ask a question. It provides:

> Whenever the United States shall use any highway for the purpose of carrying the mails, whether in the cities or in the country—

If rural mails are carried through the city to the country, this highway is used for that purpose, and the money will be paid to the city just the same as to the country.

Mr. MANN. As a matter of fact, the Shackleford amendment does not provide for paying for the use of the roads for delivering mail at all. It only provides for its use for transporting mail. What the department would rule about that I do not know. I suspect, perhaps, if they made a strict construction of it they would only provide where they transport star-route mail in connection with rural-delivery mail. But the purpose of the bill, if its purpose be effectuated, is to provide payment for the use of the country roads in the carrying of the rural free-delivery mail.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Why should we provide for that and not provide, out of the same Treasury, from taxes collected from the same people, for the use of the roads for the delivery of the city mail? Do you people from the country believe that because you have a majority in this House you can permanently establish a policy in this country which proposes directly to tax the people of the city for the specific benefit of the people in the country?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. That never has been the case in the history of the world. It never will be. You may temporarily tax one set of people for the exclusive benefit of another, but in the long run you must raise taxes equally and expend them equitably.

Now I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Does not the gentleman think that there is ample precedent furnished for this legislation in the fact that for more than 25 years from two to six free mail deliveries were made to the cities during all that period of time and no provision was made for free mail delivery to the people in the country, and the country people said nothing? [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I do not. On the contrary the city from which I come contributes to the treasury of the Post Office Department in the neighborhood of $8,000,000 a year——

Mr. MADDEN. Fourteen million three hundred and ninety thousand dollars, if the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. MANN. Contributes over $8,000,000 a year above the expense of maintaining that office and all connected with it, and that money goes to carry the rural mail in the rural districts. We do not complain of that——

Mr. MADDEN. Will my colleague yield for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. MANN. No; I regret I can not yield.

We do not complain of that, because we in the cities realize the fact that it is to our interest in sending the mail to have it properly delivered to those who shall receive it in the country, and vice versa as to the people in the country. We acknowledge that here is a fund collected from the general use of the Post Office Department that we are willing to have equitably distributed, although the man who puts a 2-cent stamp in the city is contributing directly one-half of it to the rural mail delivery in the country, for which he receives no benefit.

I appeal to this House for fairness all around, both to the country and to the city. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I shall favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. Its adoption will result in equality of treatment for the rural and urban communities. It will eliminate the special—and therefore un-Democratic—feature of the pending provision. The report which accompanies the bill states that "the basic principle of this bill is compensation by the Federal Government for the use of the roads traveled by mail carriers in the star route and Rural Delivery Service." If that principle can be justified, and the Federal Treasury reached upon such a plea, then the distribution should be free from discrimination, and the Federal Government should contribute for the use of highways in municipalities traversed in delivery of mail.

But, Mr. Chairman, the Members of this House do not know the extent of the enterprise upon which they are embarking. They have not looked carefully into the enormous outlay that will be required if the Federal Government is seriously to engage in the work of assisting in improving the roads of the country. The amount provided in this bill is a mere bagatelle. It is the cultivation of a delusion, which, if this provision becomes a law, will quickly be realized by the country, to provide an insignificant pittance.

But if there is to be provision made of this kind and compensation paid for the use of roads by the postal service, the great municipalities and the small municipalities should be placed upon the same basis as rural communities.

Since 1902 the city of New York has expended for paving and repaving its streets $71,727,619.

Mr. LEGARE. You do not need any more, then.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the past 10 years it has paved 392 miles of streets and has repaved 657, a total of 1,049. On December 31, 1911, its mileage of paved streets was 2,145, and of unpaved ones 1,650. I appreciate the willingness of some gentlemen to have one section of the country contribute to the work that should be done by other localities. The city of New York has had its burdens greatly increased from this tendency. The city pays about 70 per cent of the State taxes of the State of New York. The experience of that State in road construction is illuminating. Since 1898 it has expended in excess of $111,000,000 upon its roads. Under a constitutional amendment, adopted in 1898, the State of New York was authorized to issue $50,000,000 of bonds with which to contribute to the construction of roads. It has outlined a system of State highways and contributes to county and town highways. The proportions are 50 per cent by the State, 35 per cent by the county, and 15 per cent by the township. After the enormous expenditure of money in recent years, in addition to the sums theretofore expended, there are now in the State 3,161 miles of macadam road, about 8,915 miles of gravel roads, and about 55,507 miles of crowned highways, and 15,000 miles of ordinary country roads. According to the figures given in the report accompanying this bill, the roads used by rural and star routes in the State of New York aggregate 2,249 miles, and if every road traveled by one of these carriers were in class A, the contribution by the Federal Government to the State of New York under this bill——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my time be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent that his time be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment be closed in 10 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, has my request for 10 minutes been granted?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I asked unanimous consent to be allowed 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, moved that the debate be closed in 10 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But, Mr. Chairman, my request for unanimous consent was submitted by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. FITZGERALD. I asked consent that my time be extended 10 minutes, and I made the request before the gentleman from Tennessee asked for recognition.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has no desire to cut off debate on this proposition.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have no desire to cut off the gentleman from New York or anybody else. I will change my motion so as to ask to close debate on the amendment and all amendments to the amendment at 6 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. There can be no amendment to the Madden amendment. It is an amendment in the second degree.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I refer to amendments after that is disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] moves that all debate on the Shackleford amendment and all amendments thereto be closed at 6 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not mean all amendments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I submit that my request is entitled to be submitted to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he has recognized the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] to move to close debate, and the gentleman from New York is not now in order.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee propose to cut off all debate on other amendments to the Shackleford amendment?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I want to close debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri. If any other gentleman in the House wishes to offer an amendment I will not object.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman could not object. The gentleman agreed to be liberal, and, as he knows, there are a number of other gentlemen who desire to offer amendments. The gentleman might move to close debate on the Madden amendment in that length of time.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I withdraw my motion in order that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] may have his request put to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I wish to say to the gentleman from New York that under the operations of this bill the State of New York would derive from $800,000 to $1,000,000. It is a very simple calculation. The State of New York will derive from $800,000 to $1,000,000 annually from this bill when it is in full operation. Now, may I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Before the gentleman proceeds, on April 1, 1912, the total number of rural and star routes in operation in the State of New York was as follows: Rural, 1,899; star, 550; total, 2,449.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It is a conservative estimate to say that the average length of those routes would be 20 miles.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was mistaken in my first statement. I had confused the number of routes with the mileage.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I should like to ask the gentleman another question: Does not the State of New York provide State aid in the construction of State highways?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The State is building a system of State highways.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Does it not provide for the construction of or aid to streets in municipalities?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. I made that statement. I intend to discuss it more fully. It illustrates the tendency and the desire of localities to escape the burden they should assume. In 1899, if I recall correctly, a law was enacted in New York providing for the system of contribution whereby State aid was extended to localities. The law provided that 50 per cent of the cost of construction should be paid by the State, 35 per cent by the county, and 15 per cent by the town. Very soon it was ascertained that to some of these communities the burden was irksome, or in excess of what the people desired to contribute. Good roads were desired and the wish was equally strong that the cost should be borne other than by the localities benefited. An amendment was enacted by which it was provided that the contribution of the counties and towns should be 2 per cent on the assessed valuation of real property in the county and 1 per cent in the town, but in no instance should the county or town pay in excess of the 35 and 15 per cent proportion. The result is that in some instances the State is expending 91 per cent of the cost of the roads and the localities 9 per cent. The tendency is natural; it is human. The desire to make some one else pay is overpowering. Shift the burden from locality to the State, from the State to the Federal Government. It is as effective to avoid the eventual burden as the ostrich in escaping danger by hiding its head in the sand. The State of New York is expending $6,000,000 annually on its roads, and with this enormous expenditure it has not enough roads, if all used by the postal service were of class A, to receive, under this bill, 20 per cent of what it is itself expending.

But my objection to this legislation is fundamental. It is not predicated upon expenditure alone. It is aimed chiefly at the theory upon which the legislation is based. It introduces a new, a novel, a curious principle into our governmental system. It purports to require the Federal Government to pay localities for the privilege of furnishing some service to the people which is legitimately within the proper functions of the Federal Government. It is based on the theory that the Federal Government is something distinct, separate, apart from, superior to, and superimposed upon the people of the country; that it has some means of acquiring wealth or resources or moneys other than by obtaining them by taxation from the people, to be distributed for their benefit. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] spoke of the Federal Government being liberal in its treatment of the people. This is a strange doctrine to be enunciated by a Democrat. It is a peculiar notion that seems to be spreading. The Government should be liberal in its treatment of the people! Such a statement is strange to men who have been brought up to believe and to realize and who know what our Government is and means. Free institutions are organized by the people in order to maintain order and permit them to live in the most orderly, free, and happy manner possible consistent with the rights of others, and are predicated upon the theory that all men have certain inalienable rights, and that to preserve them governments are organized.

This idea that the Federal Government is something like the Government of the Russias, or some other imperial government, in which the people are subjects, beneficaries, supplicants, and mendicants, who beg and plead as if some great father would be persuaded to scatter his resources with generous hand and give to the people something apparently not belonging to them is a new and unheard-of and astounding doctrine in our land. Mr. Chairman, why not charge the Federal Government for the privilege of conducting Federal troops over country roads and through city streets? If the Federal Government is annoying or unkind or illiberal, why not tax it out of existence? It would be simple for the people to punish the Government by imposing burdens it could not bear. Under the Constitution exclusive jurisdiction is placed in the Congress over all places purchased by the consent of the legislatures of the States required for forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings. Under section 355 of the Revised Statutes no money can be expended upon any site or land for the erection of any public building, fortification, or similar work unless the consent of the State is first obtained to the acquisition of the property. Why not abandon the policy heretofore followed and consent that the Federal Government shall pay taxes upon its Federal buildings, taxes upon the land occupied for fortifications, and other public purposes? It is the same principle underlying this bill carried to the logical conclusion. It is something new and novel. It is merely a cloak or a cover to get the hands of the various localities into the Federal Treasury.

People shut their eyes and dream that the money they take is to be obtained from some place else than from their own pockets, but it will come from there eventually and no other place. There seems to be a widespread notion that the resources of the Federal Government are boundless, that the Treasury is overflowing. The methods by which the Federal Government obtains money is indirect and remote from the people. Its gathering hand is invisible; yet it takes its mite from every article, from every commodity that is of use to the people. It may be difficult to trace the tax; that makes some people the more ready to have it imposed. To enter this new policy means additional taxes, additional burdens. It is futile to talk of reducing taxation, of relieving the people from grievous burdens, of reducing the cost of living, if at every turn we are to be confronted with some new scheme to filch money from the Federal Treasury.

There is one source of expense to which no one has given much attention but which is a very important matter. The compensation for these roads, if there be dispute, is to be fixed by the Department of Agriculture.

The condition in which the roads are to be maintained is to be determined by the Department of Agriculture. How is the Department of Agriculture to obtain the information necessary to discharge the obligation imposed? Only by the maintenance of a force of inspectors that shall continuously keep under supervision and observation all of the roads which will be entitled to compensation because of their use by the Federal Government. It will require an army of new employees to swarm through the country. It will be inevitable that crying abuses will result from such surveillance. Congress has consistently heretofore refused to pave streets in front of public buildings and it has refused to make any contribution for the construction of sidewalks about its property, and yet gentlemen now seriously propose to compel the Government to pay the people of the various localities for the privilege of rendering an important public service to them. Why not charge the Government for every public service rendered, in the hope that in some providential manner, like manna from heaven, funds will come into the Public Treasury? [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, this legislation should not be enacted. It can not be justified upon any sound theory. It is unwise. It will lead to evils that will be deplored. It cultivates among the thoughtless and the uninformed erroneous and dangerous notions of government; it subjects the Federal Treasury to burdens for nothing essential to the discharge of its legitimate functions. It is an idle attempt to get something for nothing. Whatever is expended upon our roads will be paid for by the people. It will be better if they keep the work and the expenditure close to home. They may yet succeed in frittering away rights and privileges of inestimable value, obtained only by the expenditure of vast quantities of blood and treasure, for the unsatisfactory boon of a Federal appropriation and a dominant and irresponsive and unsympathetic Federal Government.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 22, noes 105.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding at the end of the main paragraph thereof the following:
"Provided, however, That no payment shall be made under the provisions of this paragraph for the use of any privately owned or toll road."

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that that amendment be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, at the end of line 13, H. R. 22952, add the words:
"Nor for the use of any street or highway within the limits of any city or village."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my amendment is to limit the payment——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Certainly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is the gentleman aware that in many of the New England States the limits of one village overlap the limits of another and that almost all of the roads are within the incorporated villages in the New England States?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I did not know the exact situation, but it would make no difference with my idea of the manner in which this money should be expended. My idea is that the money should be paid out to aid in the construction and maintenance of purely country roads. That has been the purpose announced by the authors of the bill, and I think the idea should be carried out. It is exactly contrary to the idea advanced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the idea advanced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. It is not necessary to speak at length about it. I would confine this bill, if it becomes a law, and the use of the money under it exclusively to the building and maintaining of country roads only.

[Mr. WARBURTON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by inserting after the words "for highways of class C" the following: "Provided, That for roads used for the purposes of transporting rural mails, meeting all the conditions and requirements of class C, except that they have a road track not less than 16 feet wide, compensation shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile, and said roads shall be known and designated as class D."

Mr. DODDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 25 for just a moment, on an amendment which I introduced at the end of line 6, in order to make the following amendment——

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman his request could be made to-morrow as well as to-day. It is 6 o'clock.

Mr. DODDS. It will only take a moment.

Mr. MANN. You can not tell how long it will take.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 21279, the Post Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess until 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning, and on convening that it shall immediately take up the Post Office appropriation bill for further consideration under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until to-morrow at 10.30, at which time it shall take up for further consideration the Post Office appropriation bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman believe he can keep the House in session from 10.30 to-morrow until 6 o'clock to-morrow afternoon under the five-minute rule?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think we can.

Mr. MANN. That will wear everybody out.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Oh, I think not. I would rather do that than to have a night session.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not expect to finish the bill to-morrow?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. We want to do all we can toward it.

Mr. MANN. Well, if it comes to that stage in the session where it will do any good to have night sessions I think everybody in the House will be perfectly willing to have night sessions, or commence at 10 o'clock in the morning, if necessary, but we have not reached that stage yet.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois we have had three or four days' debate on this bill——

Mr. MANN. And I tried to cut it off and have debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. And 20 hours' debate on the bill under the rule. We have had sessions beginning at 10.30 in the morning and one night session, and we are very much now in the way of the Committee on Appropriations, which is anxious to bring in a bill. If we want to get away in time for your national conventions, we had better be doing a good deal of work.

Mr. MANN. We will have no trouble, as far as the House is concerned, in getting away the 1st of June if there is any assurance that the other branch of Congress will get away by that time, because if it gets to the point where we need to sit we can commence at 12 o'clock and run until 12 at night, if necessary. If the gentleman meets at half past 10, we will not have 20 men in the House.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. They ought to be here.

Mr. MANN. It does not make any difference; there are only a few here now who will know about it, and they will not be here, and we will have one or two calls for a quorum, and you can not keep them here for any length of time.

Mr. GARNER. The RECORD will indicate that to-morrow morning at 10.30 a. m. the House is to meet, and if there is no quorum all you will have to do is to make the point and ring the bell, and everybody will be in here.

Mr. MANN. We did that the other day, and had a call of the House. My distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER] did not learn of it, because he was not here.

Mr. GARNER. I have been here every morning, whether at 10.30 or at 12 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not make the request. If it is necessary, we can sit later to-morrow night.

Mr. SABATH. There are a great many committee meetings to-morrow morning.

Mr. LANGLEY. The Committee on Invalid Pensions meets to-morrow morning.

Mr. MANN. As I am not on any committee, that does not bother me.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I want to be as liberal as possible in the discussion of amendments——

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I object. I have a committee meeting to-morrow morning.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion is not in order, so far as that is concerned.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Tennessee should ask unanimous consent I would not object, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will ask unanimous consent, then.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow, and at that time the Post Office appropriation bill be proceeded with.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object. I want to say the Committee on Naval Affairs has an important meeting to-morrow forenoon and I want to be present, and I would like to be present here, too.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] thinks he is of such importance that he is obliged to be here I will withdraw the request and let the responsibility rest where it is.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not think I am of so much importance, but I am a Member of this House, and I object.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 19721. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

BERKELEY, CAL., April 29, 1912.

United States Senator JOHN D. WORKS,
Care of Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Newspapers report you will oppose Owen bill Monday. I hope for your success. Consider it dangerous tendency for Federal Government to assume jurisdiction in either medical or religious matters, thereby becoming paternalistic and un-American. States have dealt adequately with subject, and should continue to do so.

J. STITT WILSON,
Mayor of Berkeley.

The Osteopathic Association of the State of California respectfully requests that you use your influence to bring about the defeat of the Owen bill, relating to the establishment of a national bureau of health. WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 30, 1912.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. Without objection, the Chair lays before the Senate, for purposes of discussion only, the following bill:

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1) to establish a department of health, and for other purposes.

Mr. WORKS rose.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from California how long he expects it will take him to conclude.

Mr. WORKS. I expect to conclude what I have to say within three-quarters of an hour.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was only asking as a matter of convenience to myself, as I expect to follow the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California will proceed.

ENFORCED PHYSICAL EXAMINATION OF SCHOOL CHILDREN.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the doctors composing boards of health are not content to leave it to the parents of school children to determine whether children shall be examined by doctors and nurses appointed by school boards to detect physical defects or not. They have, in some of the States, procured laws providing for enforced examinations, leaving no choice to the parents, and will do so in every State if they can. What I have said about the methods of the doctors will indicate what such a license would mean. Some of the doctors thus employed are honorable and conscientious men. Some of them, it may safely be said, are not. And most of them are inexperienced and some wholly incompetent. It has been said that what a doctor looks for in the way of disease he generally finds. In these school examinations they have found an astonishing number of physical defects that, in their estimation, call for surgical operations. And generally when this is necessary the doctor who discovers the fact gets the job. If he does not, some other doctor does. It adds immensely to the practice and revenues of the profession. It is a great temptation to make business and increase the practice that they say they have lost through "irregular practitioners."

This effort to get possession of the schools by the doctors, to the exclusion of the parents, has aroused very general indignation and protest. It is regarded as one more unwarranted effort of the doctors to usurp all power in the matter of health regulation and the treatment of disease. Compulsory examination is the forerunner of compulsory treatment. This statement of the conditions of things under such a law of compulsory examination in Boston is typical of all of them.

> Children of the Boston schools, by a new regulation, are made to undergo a physical examination which will necessitate the removal of clothing. A storm of protests from many parents, as well as children, was aroused yesterday when the work of examination of 800 girls of the Roxbury High School was nearly completed. Two girls strongly objected to the examination, but finally were persuaded to submit. There was another protest from the residents of West Roxbury when about 60 girls were subjected to the examinations at West Roxbury High School yesterday. One girl who objected was sent home to her parents and told to consult the family physician. How her case came out is not known. Although the statute requiring the examination has existed since 1906, the examination has not been rigidly enforced except in the primary schools, but this year it is to apply to all of the grades. It is over the high-school and normal-school girls between 14 and 18 years of age that objections are being made. The board of health and the school committee both support the regulation as necessary and essential in maintaining the health of the school children and as a preventive to disease. The heart, lungs, and spine may be examined, and feet when necessary.

Mr. President, I can not stop now to enter upon any extended argument on this question. It seems to me to be so obnoxiously subversive of every sense of personal liberty and such an encroachment on the rights of parents to have control of their children that it needs no discussion.

BILL IN VIOLATION OF RIGHTS OF THE STATES.

Mr. President, it is a conceded fact that within the States health regulations are within the power and jurisdiction of the State authorities, and it is an authority that is and should be jealously guarded. Ostensibly this bill purports to confine the activities of the Government in this respect to Federal territory and within Federal jurisdiction. If it does not, it would at once be declared unconstitutional. But one of the prime objects of the bill is to extend this power to every State in the Union, and, if it is passed, the powers granted by it will be used for that very purpose. That is the very thing the doctors are most desirous of bringing about. The bill is very ingeniously drawn to accomplish this result. It provides:

> It shall be the duty of the bureau of health to collect and disseminate information relating to the public health and to enforce the observance of all regulations and laws of the United States relating to the public health.

This is as broad and comprehensive as language can well make it. It is attempted or pretended to be modified by a proviso to the effect that this shall not authorize the bureau of health to—> exercise, or attempt to exercise, without express invitation from the chief executive or other proper authority of the State, any function belonging exclusively to such State.

Under this clause any board of health of any State composed of the very doctors who are interested in extending the power of this health bureau to the farthest limit may extend this invitation. These two interested parties will not be long in extending the activities of this bureau into the States; and, unfortunately, if it were left wholly to the executive authority of the State he would, as a rule, leave it to the health authorities and the result would be the same. The author of the bill was not quite satisfied, however, with this convenient opportunity to invade the States. The director of health is authorized, in his discretion, to appoint an advisory board of not more than seven members, who may, of course, be doctors of the regular school in as many States "to confer with him * * * concerning the health of the people," who shall hold office for a term of seven years.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WORKS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire at this point wherein does this bill differ from the so-called Borah bill establishing the children's bureau? Does this measure extend the power under that bill at all?

Mr. WORKS. It does extend the power.

Mr. HEYBURN. The power is coexistent, is it not?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understood the Senator from California supported that bill.

Mr. WORKS. "The Senator from California" did not support that bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I beg pardon.

Mr. WORKS. "The Senator from California" voted against it.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was because of such things as this, among others, that I opposed it.

Mr. WORKS. This makes a very close and satisfactory connection between State and Nation, and should be entirely satisfactory to the doctors.

But, Mr. President, the bill does not stop there. It gives the director of health power to request the health authorities of all the States to send delegates—> to confer with him or his duly appointed representatives and with each other at such time and place as he may designate concerning any particular matter or matters relating to the public health.

Not only so, but he is authorized by the provisions of the bill to call a health conference of all the States, and compelled to do so upon the petition of the health authorities of five States and Territories.

A more ingenious attempt to evade the Constitution and encroach upon the province of the States in one of their most vital and sacred rights has never been attempted. The obvious purpose is to make the head of this bureau the autocratic power that is to control the health activities of the whole country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is the Senator aware of the fact that under existing law precisely that authorization is given in connection with the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service?

Mr. WORKS. I am aware of that fact, but it is not given over to an independent bureau; it is under the Treasury Department, which is quite a different thing.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service is under that department, but at the same time the power is the same and the results, I should think, would be the same.

Mr. WORKS. I do not know whether the results are the same or not, but I think not.

All he needs is the assent and cooperation of the doctors at the head of the health boards of the several States, and as that is just what they all want and are striving to obtain by this bill, it may be regarded as done as soon as the bill becomes a law.

I commend these considerations to the careful attention of the Senate.

RESTRICTIVE LAWS IN VIOLATION OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. President, I come now to the consideration of a purely legal question presented by the enactment and enforcement of the restrictive laws that I have endeavored to bring to the attention of the Senate, including the bill under consideration, which is a part of the scheme to deprive certain people of this country of the right to heal disease and ameliorate human suffering according to their conscientious convictions; in case of some of them, according to their religious views of right and duty.

In the consideration of this question I shall be forced to give attention particularly to the rights of Christian Scientists in this respect, because, whether rightly or wrongly, they believe it to be a sacred religious duty to heal the sick by spiritual means, as they understand the scriptural command to heal the sick, and the mode of healing pointed out by the Master in His teachings and example.

This being their attitude, founded upon sincere and earnest conviction, the question at once arises whether a law that denies or abridges their right to heal in their own way, or to receive such ministration as they feel to be the proper one, is not a violation of the express provisions of the Constitution of the United States designed to protect the people of the country in the observance of their religious rights. In the settlement of this momentous question we must consider the case of both the one who administers to the sick and the one who seeks and desires this mode of treatment. Is the practitioner of this mode of healing, in which he has supreme faith and confidence, to be denied the right to exercise his right to practice? Again, is the man who has equal trust and confidence in this remedy to be denied his right to resort to it for help? If so, why? Only because some other people do not believe in it. This is the sole foundation for any and every effort that has been made to prevent or abridge such practice unless we take into account the selfish desire of those practicing other modes of healing to uphold themselves by the prohibition of this mode of healing.

Mr. President, this is the whole question. Not whether the Christian Scientist is a conscientious Christian man, honestly and trustfully depending upon Divine power for his healing, but whether some one else, who may represent, for the time being, the power of government in the enactment, construction, and enforcement of the laws, does not agree with him, but does believe with equal honesty and good faith that he is wrong in his beliefs and that the mode of healing upon which he relies is not effective, and that his pretensions are false and unfounded.

Why, Mr. President, this very conflict of views on a religious question, that might and really is being used as a ground for persecution as I have clearly shown, brings us within the very spirit and purpose of the Constitution. The great Catholic Church has its creeds and its religious convictions, with which other people of different religious views do not agree, and which some intolerant people would suppress by law if the Constitution and the courts did not stand for freedom of religious thought and observance. So it is with the powerful Protestant religious denominations.

But all of these Christian bodies believe in Divine healing. They pray to Almighty God for the healing of their sick, and believe in the efficacy of such prayer. And yet some people belonging to these religious bodies, I hope not many of them, deny to the Christian Scientist the right to heal by prayer, and denounce his pretensions to heal through the power of the same God that they serve and trust as both false and ungodly.

There is this difference between the prayer of other Christian people and Christian Scientists: Their prayer is an appeal to God for intervention in the particular case. They attempt to move God to heal the individual. The Christian Scientist believes that God is unchangeable and that He can not be moved by prayer to do or not to do a desired thing, but that He has already and for all time given man all good, which is always there for him when he conforms to His laws and does His bidding. Therefore the Christian Scientist prays not to change God or to induce Him to act, but to change man, regenerate him, and bring him into harmony with the Divine law that must restore harmony and right conditions in him, which means necessarily restoration to natural and harmonious conditions.

It is the belief of Christian Scientists that the purpose of prayer and all Christian effort is to regenerate man and bring him into reconciliation and harmony with the Divine Being, and that this effort of reconciliation and regeneration by prayer is the true, the only true, means of healing the sick.

Jesus of Nazareth was persecuted and finally crucified for preaching the gospel and practicing his religious belief, by healing the sick. To do the same to-day in the twentieth century in the great State of New York, if he were here, would make him a criminal, subject to fine and imprisonment by the laws of that State. Only a few days ago a Christian Scientist was convicted and punished for healing the sick as he believed in the way and by the same power and principle that Jesus healed.

Now, Mr. President, who is to determine which of these different beliefs sincerely entertained is right and which is wrong. Who is authorized or who will be permitted under our Constitution to declare one of these beliefs and the exercise of it in the healing of the sick a crime?

This effort to enact and enforce such laws, I am glad to say, is not being made by the people of other church denominations or by persons entertaining different religious beliefs. I think I have shown that it comes from the doctors whose emoluments are derived from the effort to heal disease in their way, not for religious but for purely material and selfish reasons.

The Constitution of the United States provides, amendments to the Constitution, Article I:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

This, of course, is a prohibition against action by the Federal Government. Article XIV, section 1, provides:

> No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

There can be no higher or more sacred privilege than that of exercising one's religion, and every citizen is entitled to protection from any law that would deny or abridge that right.

In Reynolds v. United States (98 U. S., 145, 162), the court said:

> Congress can not pass a law for the government of the Territories which shall prohibit the free exercise of religion. The first amendment to the Constitution expressly forbids such legislation. Religious freedom is guaranteed everywhere throughout the United States, so far as congressional interference is concerned.

But in that case the court distinguished between mere religious opinions and beliefs and overt acts made criminal by the laws of the land. The court, after referring to an early statute of Virginia on the subject, uses this further language:

> In the preamble of this act (12 Hening's Stat., 84) religious freedom is defined; and after a recital "that to suffer the civil magistrate to intrude his powers into the field of opinion, and to restrain the profession or propagation of principles on supposition of their ill tendency, is a dangerous fallacy which at once destroys all religious liberty," it is declared "that it is time enough for the rightful purposes of civil government for its officers to interfere when principles break out into overt acts against peace and good order." In these two sentences is found the true distinction between what properly belongs to the church and what to the State.

The effect of the decision seems to be that religious belief can not be punished; but when, under the guise of exercising one's religion, an overt act "against peace and good order" is committed the overt act is punishable by the State.

This was a case where the defendant was prosecuted for polygamy, and he defended on the ground that polygamy was allowed and recognized by his church.

I shall show, I think, to the entire satisfaction of the Senate that the healing of the sick as an act of religious duty can not be regarded as an overt act "against peace and good order," or otherwise in violation of law or public policy. But, looking at it in the light of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, and treating it as a question of the abridgment of the privileges of the citizen, the case of American School of Magnetic Healing v. McAnnulty is interesting and instructive. The case was one where the Postmaster General had excluded from the mails certain printed matter advertising the plaintiff as a magnetic healer. After pointing out that one means of healing was believed in by some and different means by others, and that no one could determine how far one was right and the other was wrong, the court said:

> Again, there are many persons who do not believe in the homeopathic school of medicine, and who think that such doctrine, if practiced precisely upon the lines set forth by its originator, is absolutely inefficacious in the treatment of diseases. Are homeopathic physicians subject to be proceeded against under these statutes and liable at the discretion of the Postmaster General, upon evidence satisfactory to him, to be found guilty of obtaining money under false pretenses and their letters stamped as fraudulent and the money contained therein as payment for their professional services sent back to the writers of the letters? And, turning the question around, can physicians of what is called the "old school" be thus proceeded against? Both of these different schools of medicine have their followers, and many who believe in the one will pronounce the other wholly devoid of merit. But there is no precise standard by which to measure the claims of either, for people do recover who are treated according to the one or the other school. And so it is said. Do people recover who are treated under this mental theory? By reason of it? That can not be averred as matter of fact. Many think they do. Others are of the contrary opinion. Is the Postmaster General to decide the question under these statutes?

The laws under consideration, without exception, place it within the power of a board of health composed of medical practitioners, usually of one school of medicine, to determine who shall practice healing. The question of their right does not depend in the least upon their knowledge of medicine or medical practice, because they make no claim to any such knowledge. Manifestly a medical practitioner can not pass upon their fitness to heal in their way, because he is as ignorant of their way of healing as they are of his. Such laws, therefore, in practical effect, declare that no one but a medical practitioner shall be allowed to practice the art of healing. Whether the act says so or not, that is its effect, and known and intended to be so. It is a denial of the right to practice except in one way. All other modes of healing are prohibited, and the right of the citizen to resort to any other is denied. As a result, there can be no advance in knowledge in other modes of healing that is not a violation of law.

Mr. President, when a question like this confronts us the people of this country had better look to their liberties. Prof. James, from whose address I have already quoted, opposed one of such bills because it was "a movement in favor of ignorance." He says, with emphasis, that—

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts is not a medical body, has no right to a medical opinion, and should not dare to take sides in medical controversies.

Truer words were never spoken, and they are just as true of the Federal Government as they are of the State of Massachusetts.

This should be enough to impel the lawmaking power to hold its hand. But if it does not, then the courts must determine whether such a law, affecting the rights of the citizen in a matter of the highest import, affecting the most sacred of his affairs, can be enacted and enforced under a Constitution like ours under the fundamental law of a Nation of freemen.

The case of State v. Biggs (133 N. C.) is a most interesting and instructive one on this subject. The defendant was prosecuted under one of the acts that I have described making it a crime to practice medicine without a license and specifically defining the meaning of the words "practicing medicine." The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Clarke, of the supreme court of that State. I take the liberty of quoting portions of the opinion:

What is "the practice of medicine and surgery" is as well understood, and its limits, as the practice of dentistry. The courts have also held that of the many schools of "medicine and surgery" the legislature could not prescribe that any one was orthodox and the other heterodox, but that those professing the different systems—"allopathic," "homeopathic," "Thompsonian," and the like—should be examined upon a course such as is taught in the best colleges of that school of practice, but that it is not essential that a member of each or of any special school should be upon the board of examiners.

* * * Under the guise of "construction" of those well-understood terms the "practice of medicine and surgery" the act essays to provide that the expression "practice of medicine and surgery" shall be construed to mean the management "for fee or reward" of any case of disease, physical or mental, real or imaginary, with or without drugs, surgical operation, surgical or mechanical appliances, or by any other method whatsoever; that is, the practice of surgery and medicine shall mean practice without surgery or medicine if a fee is charged. If no fee is charged, then the words "surgery and medicine" drop back to their usual and ordinary meaning, as by long usage known and accustomed. Where, then, is the protection to the public if such treatment is valid when done without fee or reward? Yet unless the act confers and is intended solely to confer protection upon the public it is invalid. The legislature can not forbid one man to practice a calling or profession for the benefit or profit of another.

* * * * * * * * *

* * * Then it is forbidden to relieve a case of suffering, "physical or mental," in any method unless one is an M. D. It is not even admissible to "minister to a mind diseased" in any method or even dissipate an attack of the "blues" without that label duly certified. Is not this creating a monopoly, and the worst of monopolies, that diseases shall not be cured or alleviated, whether real or imaginary, mental or physical, though without medicine or surgery, "if for a fee," unless one has undergone an examination on "anatomy, physiology, surgery, pathology, medical hygiene, chemistry, pharmacy, materia medica, therapeutics, obstetrics, and the practice of medicine"?

* * * * * * * * *

* * * The public have a right to know that those holding themselves out as members of that ancient and honorable profession are competent and duly licensed as such. The legislature can exert its police power to that end, because it is a profession whose practice requires the highest skill and learning. But there are methods of treatment which do not require much skill and learning, if any. Patients have a right to use such methods if they wish, and the attempt to require an examination of the character above recited for the application of such treatment is not warranted by any legitimate exercise of the police power. * * *

The term "practice of medicine and surgery" embraces probably the larger, and certainly by far the most profitable, part of the "treatment of diseases," but is not coextensive with the latter term, and can not be made so unless "surgery and medicine" are adopted as the State system of treatment, a monopoly, and all other methods are made indictable. On the other hand, the State Medical Society would hardly wish to broaden out so as to take in all methods of treatment of disease, for this would be to take in practitioners and practices which they would not wish to recognize. All the law so far has done or can do is to require that those practicing on the sick with knife and drugs shall be examined and found competent by those "of like faith and order."

Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, in an address before the Medical Society in Massachusetts, said: "If the whole materia medica was sunk to the bottom of the sea it would be all the better for mankind and all the worse for the fishes." An eminent medical authority in this State has said that out of 24 serious cases of disease 3 could not be cured by the best remedies, 3 others might be benefited, and the rest would get well anyway. Stronger statements could be cited from the most eminent medical authorities the world has known. Medicine is an experimental, not an exact, science. All the law can do is to regulate and safeguard the use of powerful and dangerous remedies, like the knife and drugs, but it can not forbid dispensing with them. When the Master, who was Himself called the Good Physician, was told that other than His followers were casting out devils and curing diseases, He said, "Forbid them not."

The case last referred to did not relate to the religious side of the question. The defendant made no claim that gave rise to any such question. But the courts of this country have jealously guarded the religious rights and opinions of the people as within the protection of the Constitution. The case of the Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States (143 U. S., 457), while not involving a constitutional question, is an interesting one as showing the attitude of the highest court in the country in matters of religion.

The plaintiff in the case had, by contract, employed a foreigner as its minister or rector. The question was whether such a contract was in violation of the statute forbidding the "importation and migration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labor in the United States." It was conceded that the case was within the letter of the statute, but it was held not to be within its spirit. The court, looking to the title of the act and the evils evidently intended to be met by it, decided that its object was to "stay the influx of cheap unskilled labor" into this country.

In commenting upon this situation Mr. Justice Brewer had this to say on the religious phase of the question:

But beyond all these matters no purpose of action against religion can be imputed to any legislation, State or national, because this is a religious people. This is historically true. From the discovery of this continent to the present hour there is a single voice making this affirmation.

And, after referring to numerous historical instances showing the reliance of our people upon Divine guidance and support in dealing with grave problems and important events, the learned justice says further:

Coming nearer to the present time, the Declaration of Independence recognizes the presence of the Divine in human affairs in these words: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." "We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America, in general Congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by authority of the good people of these Colonies, solemnly publish and declare," etc. "And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

If we examine the constitutions of the various States we find in them a constant recognition of religious obligations. Every constitution of every one of the 44 States contains language which either directly or by clear implication recognizes a profound reverence for religion and an assumption that its influence in all human affairs is essential to the well-being of the community. This recognition may be in the preamble, such as is found in the constitution of Illinois, 1870: "We, the people of the State of Illinois, grateful to Almighty God for the civil, political, and religious liberty which He hath so long permitted us to enjoy, and looking to Him for a blessing upon our endeavors to secure and transmit the same unimpaired to succeeding generations," etc.

He proceeds at length to quote from the constitutions of the various States, showing their intention to encourage free and unrestrained reliance upon religion in the affairs of men. Then he says:

There is no dissonance in these declarations. There is a universal language pervading them all, having one meaning; they affirm and reaffirm that this is a religious Nation. These are not individual sayings, declarations of private persons; they are organic utterances; they speak the voice of the entire people. While, because of a general recognition of this truth, the question has seldom been presented to the courts, yet we find that in Updegraph v. The Commonwealth (11 S. & R., 394, 400) it was decided that "Christianity, general Christianity, is, and always has been, a part of the common law of Pennsylvania; * * * not Christianity with an established church, and tithes, and spiritual courts, but Christianity with liberty of conscience to all men." And in The People v. Ruggles (8 Johns, 290, 294, 295) Chancellor Kent, the great commentator on American law, speaking as chief justice of the Supreme Court of New York, said: "The people of this State, in common with the people of this country, profess the general doctrines of Christianity as the rule of their faith and practice; and to scandalize the author of these doctrines is not only, in a religious point of view, extremely impious, but even in respect to the obligations due to society is a gross violation of decency and good order. * * * The free, equal, and undisturbed enjoyment of religious opinion, whatever it may be, and free and decent discussions on any religious subject is granted and secured; but to revile, with malicious and blasphemous contempt, the religion professed by almost the whole community is an abuse of that right. Nor are we bound by any expressions in the Constitution, as some have strangely supposed, either not to punish at all or to punish indiscriminately the like attacks upon the religion of Mahomet or of the Grand Lama, and for this plain reason, that the case assumes that we are a Christian people, and the morality of the country is deeply ingrafted upon Christianity and not upon the doctrines or worship of those impostors." And in the famous case of Vidal v. Girard's Executors (2 How., 127, 198) this court, while sustaining the will of Mr. Girard, with its provision for the creation of a college into which no minister should be permitted to enter, observed: "It is also said, and truly, that the Christian religion is a part of the common law of Pennsylvania."

Mr. Tiedeman, in his work, State and Federal Control of Persons and Property, says:

The complete abrogation of all State interference in matters of religion is of slow growth and can only be attained with the growth of public opinion.

The one great trouble is that so many sects or churches believe that theirs is the only religion and that every claim of religious belief that conflicts with theirs is un-Christian and no religion at all. It is this spirit and the intolerance that springs from it that stands in the way of every change of religious belief or the establishment of any new or reform movement of a religious character. That is just what the Christian Scientists are combating to-day. While they agree with the orthodox churches in all the essentials of the Christian religion, they are denounced as an ungodly people because they go further than the old churches in attempting to obey the whole command: "Preach the gospel and heal the sick."

That they believe in all the essentials of the Christian religion is fully shown by the tenets of the church, as follows:

1. As adherents of Truth, we take the inspired Word of the Bible as our sufficient guide to eternal Life.
2. We acknowledge and adore one supreme and infinite God. We acknowledge His Son, one Christ; the Holy Ghost or divine Comforter; and man in God's image and likeness.
3. We acknowledge God's forgiveness of sin in the destruction of sin and the spiritual understanding that casts out evil as unreal. But the belief in sin is punished so long as the belief lasts.
4. We acknowledge Jesus's atonement as the evidence of divine, efficacious Love, unfolding man's unity with God through Christ Jesus the Way-shower; and we acknowledge that man is saved through Christ, through Truth, Life, and Love, as demonstrated by the Galilean Prophet in healing the sick and overcoming sin and death.
5. We acknowledge that the crucifixion of Jesus and His resurrection served to uplift faith, to understand eternal Life, even the allness of Soul, Spirit, and the nothingness of matter.
6. And we solemnly promise to watch and pray for that Mind to be in us which was also in Christ Jesus: to do unto others as we would have them do unto us; and to be merciful, just, and pure.

Believing, as they do, that the healing of disease is a Christian duty imposed upon them by the command of the Master, a law that forbids it or abridges their right and privilege to heal the sick is a plain violation of both of the constitutional inhibitions above mentioned.

Mr. Tiedeman says further on this subject:

SEC. 63. Police regulation of religion—constitutional restrictions: If there were no provisions in the American Constitution especially applicable to the matter of police regulation of religion, the considerations which would deny to the State the control and prevention of vice would also constitute insuperable objections to State interference in matters of religion. But the rivalry and contention of the religious sects not only demanded constitutional prohibition of the interference of the National Government, but gave rise to the incorporation of like prohibitions in the various State constitutions. The exact phraseology varies with each constitution, but the practical effect is believed in the main to be the same in all of them. These provisions not only prohibit all church establishments, but also guarantee to each individual the right to worship God in his own way, and to give free expression to his religious views. The prohibition of a religious establishment not only prevents the establishment of a distinctively State church, but likewise prohibits all preferential treatment of the sects in the bestowal of State patronage or aid. A law is unconstitutional which gives to one or more religious sects a privilege that is not enjoyed equally by all. "Whatever establishes a distinction against one class or sect is, to the extent to which the distinction operates unfavorably, a persecution, and if based on religious grounds a religious persecution. The extent of the discrimination is not material to the principle, it is enough that it creates an inequality of right or privilege."

And the reasons that brought about this constitutional inhibition against interference with religious belief and observance is thus clearly pointed out by the same author:

* * * Most of the immigrants to American colonies were refugees from religious oppression, driven to the wilds of America in order to worship the God of the universe according to the dictates of their conscience. The Puritans of New England, the Quakers of Pennsylvania, the English Catholics of Maryland, and the Huguenots of the Carolinas sought on this continent that religious liberty which was not to be found in Europe. I should not say "religious liberty," for that is not what they sought. They desired only to be freed from the restraint of an intolerant and imposing majority. They desired only to settle in a country where the adherents of their peculiar creed could control the affairs of state. Notwithstanding their sad experience in the Old World, when they settled in America they became as intolerant of dissenters from the faith of the majority as their enemies had been toward them.

Mr. President, I need not, in a body like this, consume time in discussing fundamental questions affecting the liberty and freedom of the individual and the necessary restraints imposed upon him because of his association with others, composing civil or governmental organizations. But the claim of right to restrain such liberties for the good of the community or the public has given rise to many problems and has unjustly deprived many of their liberties. The police power, so called, is sometimes necessary for the protection of the public, but it has quite as frequently been made the engine of oppression to the destruction, without just cause, of the most sacred rights of the individual citizen. Generally the courts stand in the way of the unlawful use of this power, but the extent to which it has been enforced by the courts at times has been most alarming.

There is no case, perhaps, in which an unlawful and oppressive use of this great power has occurred to a greater extent than in the cases I am now considering. The doctors assume, and are able to make lawmakers believe, that the effort to heal disease in any way but theirs is against public policy and should, as a police regulation, be suppressed by law. That is the ground upon which all of the restrictive laws that I have been discussing are attempted to be sustained.

Unfortunately such laws are neither enacted nor construed by the courts from knowledge or upon evidence proving the inefficacy of the mode of healing sought to be prevented. More unfortunately still, in the minds of many the question resolves itself into a religious one that in the intolerant religious mind is controlled neither by reason nor justice. With such, if a thousand respectable and reliable people should testify to their healing through such means they would not be credited as against one competent medical practitioner who should say that disease could not be cured that way, or the word of one theologian who should insist that the attempt to heal in any such way is un-Christian and ungodly.

I hope the Senate of the United States will be actuated by a higher and broader sense of the rights and liberties of the citizen and judge the question by the rules of right, justice, and reason.

Judge Cooley, in his admirable work on Constitutional Limitations, thus defines the police power of a State:

The police of a State, in a comprehensive sense, embraces its whole system of internal regulation, by which the State seeks not only to preserve the public order and to prevent offenses against the State, but also to establish for the intercourse of citizens with citizens those rules of good manners and good neighborhood which are calculated to prevent a conflict of rights, and to insure to each the uninterrupted enjoyment of his own so far as is reasonably consistent with a like enjoyment of rights by others.

Of course the exercise of this power usually arises in respect of the use of property. But it does present itself upon the question of religious liberty. In speaking of the constitutional inhibition against laws affecting religious beliefs and observance, Judge Cooley says further:

Those things which are not lawful under any of the American constitutions may be stated thus:

1. Any law respecting an establishment of religion. The legislatures have not been left at liberty to effect a union of church and state, or to establish preferences by law in favor of any one religious persuasion or mode of worship. There is not complete religious liberty where any one sect is favored by the State and given an advantage by law over other sects. Whatever establishes a distinction against one class or sect is, to the extent to which the distinction operates unfavorably, a persecution; and if based on religious grounds, a religious persecution. The extent of the discrimination is not material to the principle; it is enough that it creates an inequality of right or privilege. * * *

4. Restraints upon the free exercise of religion according to the dictates of the conscience. No external authority is to place itself between the finite being and the infinite when the former is seeking to render the homage that is due, and in a mode which commends itself to his conscience and judgment as being suitable for him to render, and acceptable to its object.

5. Restraints upon the expression of religious belief. An earnest believer usually regards it as his duty to propagate his opinions, and to bring others to his views. To deprive him of this right is to take from him the power to perform what he considers a most sacred obligation.

Mr. Freund, in his work on Police Power, in speaking under a subhead entitled "Restraint of religious activity in behalf of the public welfare," has this to say:

There are two kinds of legislation that would fall under this head—measures for the repression of practices deemed disorderly or dangerous and the regulation of religious societies, chiefly with reference to their property rights. This legislation will also be considered separately.

The essence and value of the constitutional guaranty lies in two points: First, that religious belief as such and its peaceful and orderly manifestation in worship and precept may not be treated as a menace to the peace and welfare of the community or as a possible cause of disorder; and, second, that whatever restraint is placed upon religious activity, through rules of property or otherwise, must be applied to all denominations alike in order to avoid the preference and discrimination which the constitutions forbid.

Mr. President, it will be found that the police power can not be invoked to restrain religious belief or action except where the acts committed in the name of religion are in some way a menace to the peace and welfare of the community or, as is said in Reynolds v. United States, already referred to, "against peace and good order."

In Ex parte Jentzsch (112 Cal., 468), the Supreme Court of California, in passing upon a law of that State closing barber shops on Sunday, has this to say:

Upon the question thus presented of the proper limits of the police power, much might be written, and much, indeed, will have to be written, ere just bounds are set to its exercise; but, in this case, neither time permits nor necessity demands the consideration. Still, it may be suggested, in passing, that our Government was not designed to be paternal in form. We are a self-governing people, and our just pride is that our laws are made by us as well as for us. Every individual citizen is to be allowed so much liberty as may exist without impairment of the equal rights of his fellows. Our institutions are founded upon the conviction that we are not only capable of self-government as a community but, what is the logical necessity, that we are capable to a great extent of individual self-government. If this conviction shall prove ill founded we have built our house upon sand. The spirit of a system such as ours is therefore at total variance with that which, more or less veiled, still shows in the paternalism of other nations. It may be injurious to health to eat bread before it is 24 hours old, yet it would strike us with surprise to see the legislature making a crime of the sale of fresh bread. We look with disfavor upon such legislation as we do upon the enactment of sumptuary laws. We do not even punish a man for his vices unless they be practiced openly, so as to lead to the spread of corruption or to breaches of the peace or to public scandal. In brief, we give to the individual the utmost possible amount of personal liberty, and, with that guaranteed him, he is treated as a person of responsible judgment, not as a child in his nonage, and is left free to work out his destiny as impulse, education, training, heredity, and environment direct him.

So, while the police power is one whose proper use makes most potently for good, in its undefined scope and inordinate exercise lurks no small danger to the Republic, for the difficulty which is experienced in defining its just limits and bounds affords a temptation to the legislature to encroach upon the rights of citizens with experimental laws, none the less dangerous because well meant.

There are cases in which the true distinction is clearly made between the proper exercise of religious duties, according to one's conscience, and the commission of unlawful acts under the guise of religious beliefs. It must be conceded that no one school should be allowed to commit a crime or any act against peace, good order, or morals, and then justify himself under the claim that the act was in accordance with his religious beliefs.

This distinction is clearly drawn in Davis v. Beason (133 U. S., 333, 342), where the Supreme Court of the United States, through Mr. Justice Field, made this clear and convincing statement of the rule on the subject:

The term "religion" has reference to one's views of his relations to his Creator, and to the obligations they impose of reverence for his being and character, and of obedience to His will. It is often confounded with the cultus, or form of worship of a particular sect, but is distinguishable from the latter. The first amendment to the Constitution, in declaring that Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or forbidding the free exercise thereof, was intended to allow everyone under the jurisdiction of the United States to entertain such notions respecting his relations to his Maker and the duties they impose as may be approved by his judgment and conscience, and to exhibit his sentiments in such form of worship as he may think proper, not injurious to the equal rights of others, and to prohibit legislation for the support of any religious tenets, or the modes of worship of any sect. The oppressive measures adopted and the cruelties and punishments inflicted by the Governments of Europe for many ages to compel parties to conform, in their religious beliefs and modes of worship, to the views of the most numerous sect and the folly of attempting in that way to control the mental operations of persons and enforce an outward conformity to a prescribed standard led to the adoption of the amendment in question.

It was never intended or supposed that the amendment could be invoked as a protection against legislation for the punishment of acts inimical to the peace, good order, and morals of society. With man's relations to his Maker and the obligations he may think they impose, and the manner in which an expression shall be made by him of his belief on those subjects, no interference can be permitted, provided always the laws of society, designed to secure its peace and prosperity and the morals of its people, are not interfered with. However free the exercise of religion may be, it must be subordinate to the criminal laws of the country, passed with reference to actions regarded by general consent as properly the subjects of punitive legislation. There have been sects which denied as a part of their religious tenets that there should be any marriage tie, and advocated promiscuous intercourse of the sexes as prompted by the passions of its members. And history discloses the fact that the necessity of human sacrifices, on special occasions, has been a tenet of many sects. Should a sect of either of these kinds ever find its way into this country, swift punishment would follow the carrying into effect of its doctrines, and no heed would be given to the pretense that, as religious beliefs, their supporters could be protected in their exercise by the Constitution of the United States. Probably never before in the history of this country has it been seriously contended that the whole punitive power of the Government for acts, recognized by the general consent of the Christian world in modern times as proper matters for prohibitory legislation, must be suspended in order that the tenets of a religious sect encouraging crime may be carried out without hindrance.

In construing the restrictive laws of State legislatures the State courts have sometimes held that they should not be construed as prohibiting the practice of healing by other than medical practitioners, because the intention to legislate against the liberties of the citizen should not be assumed. In the case of Nelson v. State Board of Health (22 Ky., Law Rep., 438) the attempt was made to prevent an osteopath from practicing his profession in that State because he had not procured a license to practice from the board of health. The court held that the osteopath was not within the terms of the statute, because he was not practicing medicine, and said:

If the act applied to appellant, he can in no case practice his system in this State, for, however well qualified he may be, he can not be examined for license as a physician, and he could not, without abandoning his practice as an osteopath, obtain a diploma from a medical college. If the statute applies to him, it also applies to trained nurses and all others of that class who for compensation administer to the wants of the sick. The result of such a construction of the statute would be to compel everyone, whether willing or unwilling, to employ a registered physician to care for him when he is sick, or to trust himself entirely to gratuitous services, however much he might prefer skillful nursing to medical treatment. It is doubtful if the legislature has the right under the Constitution thus to restrict the free choice of the citizen in a matter concerning only himself and not the people at large. Taking the statute as a whole, we do not think that this was within the legislative intent, or that the act was designed to do more than regulate the practice of medicine by physicians and surgeons.

The case of State v. Mylod (20 R. I., 632) is to the same effect. In that case it was said:

It follows therefore that the acts complained of are excluded from the operation of said Cap. 165 unless the words "practice of medicine," taken in their ordinary or popular meaning, includes them, or unless it appears from said chapter that the legislative intent was to give to said words a meaning broader and more inclusive than the popular one.

Medicine, in the popular sense, is a remedial substance. The practice of medicine, as ordinarily or popularly understood, has relation to the art of preventing, curing, or alleviating disease or pain. It rests largely in the sciences of anatomy, physiology, and hygiene; it requires a knowledge of disease, its origin, its anatomical and physiological features, and its causative relations; and, further, it requires a knowledge of drugs, their preparation and action. Popularly it consists in the discovery of the cause and nature of disease and the administration of remedies or the prescribing of treatment therefor.

Prayer for those suffering from disease, or words of encouragement or the teaching that disease will disappear and physical perfection be attained as a result of prayer or that humanity will be brought into harmony with God by right thinking and a fixed determination to look on the bright side of life, does not constitute the practice of medicine in the popular sense.

While it true that the study and treatment of mental disease constitute one of the departments or branches of medicine in which the influence of the mind over the body is recognized, yet mere words of encouragement, prayer for divine assistance, or the teaching of Christian Science as testified, in the opinion of the court, does not constitute the practice of medicine in either of its branches in the statutory or popular sense.

To give to the words "practice of medicine" the construction claimed for them by the State, in the opinion of the court, would lead to unintended results. The testimony shows that Christian Scientists are a recognized sect or school. They hold common beliefs, accept the same teachings, recognize as true the same theories and principles. If the practice of Christian Science is the practice of medicine, Christian Science is a school or system of medicine, and is entitled to recognition by the State board of health to the same extent as other schools or systems of medicine. Under said Cap. 165 it can not be discriminated against, and its members are entitled to certificates to practice medicine provided they possess the statutory qualifications. The statute, in conferring upon the State board of health authority to pass upon the qualification of applicants for such certificates, does not confer upon said board arbitrary power. The board can not determine which school or system of medicine in its theories and the practices is right; it can only determine whether the applicant possesses the statutory qualification to practice in accordance with the recognized theories of a particular school or system.

It would be absurd to hold that under said Cap. 165, which provides against discrimination, the requirements necessary to entitle an applicant to a certificate were such that the members of a particular school or system could not comply with them, thus adopting a construction which would operate not as a discrimination only, but as a prohibition. On the other hand, to hold that a person who does not know or pretend to know anything about disease, or about the method of ascertaining the presence or the nature of disease, or about the nature, preparation, or use of drugs or remedies, and who never administers them, may obtain a certificate to practice medicine, is to hold that the operation of the statute is to defeat the beneficial purposes for which it was enacted.

The case of State v. McKnight (131 N. C.) was another action affecting the right of an osteopathic practitioner to practice without a license. The court in that case used this language:

The State has not restricted the cure of the body to the practice of medicine and surgery—"allopathy," as it is termed—nor required that before anyone can be treated for any bodily ill the physician must have acquired a competent knowledge of allopathy and be licensed by those skilled therein. To do that would be to limit progress by establishing allopathy as the State system of healing and forbidding all others. This would be as foreign to our system as a State church for the cure of souls. All the State has done has been to enact that when one wishes to practice "medicine or surgery" he must, as a protection to the public—not to the doctors—be examined and licensed by those skilled in "surgery and medicine." To restrict all healing to that one kind—to allopathy—excluding homeopathy, osteopathy, and all other treatments, might be a protection to doctors in "surgery and medicine," but that is not the object of the act, and might make it unconstitutional, because creating a monopoly.

The State can only regulate for the protection of the public. There is also "divine science" (which some one has said is neither divine nor a science), and there may be other methods still. Whether these shall be licensed and regulated is a matter for the lawmaking power to determine before any question in that respect can come before the court. Certainly a statute requiring examination and license "before beginning the practice of medicine or surgery" neither regulates nor forbids any mode of treatment which absolutely excludes medicines and surgery from its pathology.

Mr. President, this confirms what I have already said—that where the statute provides in terms for the regulation of the practice of medicine and surgery schools of practitioners who do not resort to the use of drugs or the knife are not affected and therefore not interested in its enforcement. But the trouble is that in many of these laws the definition of "practicing medicine" includes all kinds of healing or treatment, thus avoiding the effect of the decided cases on the subject. So in such cases the question becomes one of the constitutionality of the law. No one should question the constitutional right of the States to regulate the "practice of medicine and surgery." Certainly I do not. Anyone who practices the use of drugs or the knife should establish his competency in that respect. The legislature of a State would undoubtedly have the right, also, to regulate the practice of Christian Science by providing for the establishment of a board of examiners to determine their fitness and competency to practice that mode of healing. But the board should, of course, have knowledge of the qualifications necessary for such practice.

Christian Scientists would welcome such a law, as they desire that only persons competent and conscientious should practice their mode of healing. What they and different schools of medicine object to is that they shall be examined as to their competency to practice a means of healing in which they do not believe and in which they do not claim to be efficient or competent. The result of such a law is to compel an examination as to their competency to practice a system of healing, not with any view of determining their fitness to practice what they make claim to practice.

That means simple prohibition just as effectually as if the statute provided in terms that a Christian Scientist shall not practice healing or the amelioration of suffering. This distinction was recognized in the State v. Wilcox (64 Kans., 789), in which the court, having held that the State had the power to regulate the practice of medicine, said further:

The act is not invalid because it provides that "Nothing in this act shall be construed as interfering with any religious beliefs in the treatment of diseases, providing that quarantine regulations relating to contagious diseases are not infringed upon." (Sec. 6, Gen. Stat., 1901, par. 6674.) The express exclusion of the element of religious belief in the application of the law was hardly necessary. Religious freedom is guaranteed by the Constitution, and without mention in the statute would have been implied, and we can see nothing in this provision which makes an illegal discrimination against or in favor of any class of physicians.

This language is significant. It expressly recognizes the fact that religious freedom exercised in the way of healing can not be abridged under the Constitution.

Mr. President, the question of both the constitutionality and justice of some of the bills enacted by State legislation intended to restrict or prohibit the practice of healing by Christian Scientists have been commented upon by the governors of some of the States in veto messages. Thus Gov. Mickey, of Nebraska, has this to say in one of his veto messages:

The constitution of the State of Nebraska declares that "all persons have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences," and further adds, "nor shall any interference with the rights of conscience be permitted." In the Christian Science religion the idea of worship and of divine healing are so intermingled that it is impossible to draw the line of demarcation, and hence interference with the one or the other is an interference with "the rights of conscience" and thus becomes an infringement of the constitutional guaranty of religious freedom.

And Gov. Peabody, of Colorado, used this language in a message vetoing such a bill:

Guided by the late experience of similar legislation in other States, the conclusion is irresistible that all such legislation has a tendency to restrict the citizen in the employment of whomsoever he pleases in the treatment of his diseases, and it also has a tendency to build up, under the protection of the State, a trust or combination of certain schools of medicine to the exclusion of all others equally meritorious.

Gov. Thomas, of the same State, in a like case, used this clear and emphatic language:

The department of surgery excepted, medicine is not a science. It is a series of experiments, more or less successful, and will become a science when the laws of health and disease are fully ascertained and understood. This can be done, not by arresting the progress of experiment and binding men down to hard and fast rules of treatment, but by giving free rein to the man who departs from the beaten highway and discovers hidden methods and remedies by the wayside. * * *

The true intent and purpose of the bill is to restrict the profession of medicine to the three schools therein mentioned, and then limit the number of practitioners to suit the judgment of the composite board. People desiring medical or surgical service may employ its licentiates or die without the consolation of the healer. This is but to say that a medical trust is to be established which shall regulate demand and supply by absolute control of the product which forms its basis, the general assembly furnishing the appliances whereby the trust shall become effectual.

The integrity and usefulness of every profession must be guaranteed to society, which may establish standards for the members thereof and for the observance of which its sanction should be given. Beyond this, each profession takes care of itself, and legislative interference is tyranny, open or disguised. * * *

The fundamental vice of the bill is that it denies absolutely to the individual the right to select his own physician. This is a right of conscience, and as sacred as that which enables the citizen to worship God as he may desire. It is, indeed, the same right manifesting itself in a parallel direction. It is a part of the law of this land, and no civil power is strong enough to deprive the citizen of its exercise. He may, indeed, select a healer of doubtful reputation or conceded incompetence, but that is his affair just as much as is his choice of a minister or attorney. His action may prove injurious, possibly fatal, to himself or to some members of his family. It is better so than to delegate to any tribunal the power to say "thou shalt not employ this man" or "thou shalt employ this one." That this bill produces such a result indirectly makes it the more objectionable. It is not the outspoken and aggressive assault upon individual liberty that men should fear, but the indirect or resultant blow that is masked and falls unexpectedly.

The bill, like all kindred forms of paternalism, assumes that the citizen can not take care of himself. The State must lead him as a little child, lest he fall into trouble unawares. He must be guarded and chided, limited here and licensed there, for his own protection. Such a system, born of the union of church and state, crumbles into ashes in the crucible of experience. It can not flourish, though disguised in the garments of an alleged public necessity. The privilege of choosing one's own physician is a positive essential to the public health. Yet this bill assumes to thrust the coarse machinery of the criminal law into one of the most sacred relations of human life, to drag the chosen physician, if unlicensed, from the sick couch to the prison cell, and to substitute for him some one who, however exalted and honorable, may not command the confidence or secure the sympathy of his patient.

These comments are not extreme, for it must be remembered that those who believe in and patronize the various arts of healing that are ostracized by this bill form a very large part of every community, nor are they confined to the ignorant and superstitious portions of society. They number in their ranks thousands of the most refined, intelligent, and conscientious people. They recognize in many modern forms of relief to the suffering a religious or spiritual element that appeals to their best and tenderest sympathies. The benefits they claim and the cures they narrate are not imaginary. Shall the Government enact by statute that these people shall not longer enjoy their benefits or put them into daily practice? Shall it officially declare these people to be criminally wrong and the three schools legally right? By what authority does it so declare?

A distinguished physician of Massachusetts has recently declared with force that "the Commonwealth has no right to a medical opinion and should not dare to take sides in a medical controversy." It would be as consistent to take sides in a theological or philosophical discussion. The one would be condemned by all men; the other is equally foreign to the province of government. It may regulate but can not prohibit the calling of the citizens; it may prevent the commission of wrongs but can not deprive the individual of the right to choose his own advisers.

Mr. President, I am about to conclude what I have to say. I have taken up too much of the time of the Senate. But I could not remain silent when the liberties of the people and the constitutional rights of the States are threatened. There has been no legislation more dangerous or pernicious than the entire system of laws, State and National, that are being forced upon the people of this country by the political doctors, who are considering only their own selfish interests without regard to the public welfare. I have considered not only the bill now before the Senate but legislation in the States, because they are a part of one general effort to procure legislation that will establish forever one school of medicine to the exclusion of all others.

If this effort is successful it will create the worst, the most intolerant, and the most dangerous monopoly and trust the country has ever known. It will be the more intolerant and offensive, as well as more powerful, because it is a trust created by law and supported by all the powers of the Government. The author of the bill has graciously consented to amend it so as to provide that there shall be no discrimination in favor of or against any school of medicine. He could very well do this. It is a perfectly harmless and useless provision and will protect no one. Does anyone suppose that this bureau, made independent by this bill, with an allopathic doctor at its head, and without doubt a member of the American Medical Association, will give any consideration to any mode of healing that does not use drugs, or not discriminate against them, and in favor of the regular school of medicine? Can anyone think so when we look back over the past few years and see how these very same doctors of the regular school have been using every possible means to procure such laws as will not only discriminate against but actually exterminate them? Now, it is proposed to take the medical bureaus and others in any way connected with the preservation of the public health out of the departments and bring them under one control, independent and autocratic. What may be expected to happen? Why, with this unlimited power in his hands, with the right to make rules and regulations for the government of his department, he will do, by his rules and regulations, just what he and his fellow doctors have for years been trying to get the States to do by law, declare the practice of Christian Science and other modes of healing that they have condemned as a menace to the public health and suppress such practice. You say he is not allowed to discriminate or to interfere with the practice of medicine!

Why, Mr. President, if he is honest, and has been honest in promoting restrictive and prohibitive legislation in the States against such practices, he will say: "I must protect the public health. That is the prime duty imposed upon me by this law. To do it I must destroy the tendency to put away drugs and resort to quacks and charlatans. They are not entitled to protection. I will do my duty and suppress them in every way possible." If anyone supposes that ways will not be found to accomplish this result, with a doctor in control and at the head of a bureau that is independent of control by any higher power, he does not appreciate the capacity of the regular school of medicine to maintain itself by the destruction of other means of healing.

Mr. President, as I have said, this whole movement is by and in the interest of doctors of the regular school. No one else is demanding this law. They have manipulated political conventions and procured a plank in the platform of both of the great political parties, declaring in favor of establishing a department of health, with its head a member of the Cabinet. They have besieged the White House and pleaded for assistance from the President. They have infested the Halls of Congress for years past in the effort to secure the passage of laws that would place them in power and give them absolute control of the medical activities of the Government. In pressing forward this bold scheme they have tried to deceive the public, and have largely succeeded, by claiming that such legislation is in the public interest. They insist that their mode of healing is the only safe or reliable one, and that to resort to any other is to endanger the public health.

Their efforts have of late been directed chiefly against Christian Scientists and their mode of practice. They insist that the practice of their mode of healing is a fraud on the people and a menace to the public health. Why, Mr. President, I could by a mere call fill this Capitol Building with conscientious and reliable men and women, people of high character and unquestioned sincerity, who would bear witness to their healing by this means and their faith in its efficacy. Thousands of these, many of them within my own personal knowledge, have been healed of what the doctors call incurable diseases, and many of them after the doctors had given up their cases as hopeless.

Naturally these people protest against any law that will deprive them, or anyone else, of the right to resort to this remedy for their relief. In the name of these people, in the name of those believing in other modes of healing, in the name of a liberty-loving people, I protest against any law or regulation that will deny them the right or abridge their liberty to give or accept relief of their choice, or their religious rights.

COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. BRIGGS. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). If there be no objection, the report will be received out of order. The Chair hears none.

The resolution (S. Res. 295) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on National Banks be, and it hereby is, authorized to employ a clerk at a salary of $2,220 per annum and a messenger at $1,440 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SHIVELY. Will the Senator from New Jersey explain the resolution?

Mr. BRIGGS. This is a new committee, and the resolution is to give them the usual help.

Mr. SHIVELY. What help do they need? What will be the duties of the committee?

Mr. BRIGGS. I do not know that I can state the duties of all the committees, but they are the usual duties and it is the usual force.

Mr. SHIVELY. This is a new committee which has been created; I suppose it will have jurisdiction of certain subjects matter; and I was a little curious to know whether it will have any duties.

Mr. BRIGGS. It is the Committee on National Banks.

Mr. SMOOT. The junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS] is chairman of the committee, and of course he will have all his duties not only as chairman of the committee, but as a Senator, and the duties that come to him as a member of other committees. The resolution simply provides for a clerk and messenger for that committee.

Mr. SHIVELY. For a necessary committee?

Mr. BRIGGS. It is a new committee.

Mr. SHIVELY. That has important duties to perform?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator certainly has important duties to perform, whether the committee will have or not.

Mr. SHIVELY. I oppose the creation of committees if it be for the sole purpose of services to a Senator. If the committee is needed to facilitate the business of the Senate, create it. If the creation of the new committee is not for the transaction of committee business, say so. If it is a contrivance to create personal assistants to a Senator in the guise of providing assistance to a committee, let that be understood. It provides pay for an additional committee clerk and messenger, does it?

Mr. BRIGGS. That is all.

Mr. SMOOT. It provides for the same help that every minority Member of the Senate has. It is simply providing for a clerk and messenger for the junior Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIVELY. The only difference is that it is the creation of a new committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BRIGGS. The resolution does not create a new committee. That has already been done. The resolution simply provides for help.

Mr. SHIVELY. It provides the money to pay a clerk and a messenger.

Mr. BRIGGS. A clerk and a messenger.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator whether this new committee which it is proposed to create will have any actual legislation to consider.

Mr. SMOOT. It has been created.

Mr. BRIGGS. The Senator from Nebraska knows just as much about that as I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am asking for information.

Mr. BRIGGS. The Senator will have to ask some one who knows more than I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is there anyone here who can state whether there is any proposed legislation which at any time will be referred to this committee, and that the committee will ever have anything to consider?

Mr. BRIGGS. I do not think anyone can prophesy as to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I was responsible for reporting the resolution which created this committee. I think a Committee on National Banks is a committee that might well have legislation referred to it. I have no doubt but that there will be more or less legislation referred to the committee. But if the Senator from Nebraska is going to raise that question and pin us down to saying that there will be bills referred to that committee, the Senator knows exactly what the result will be, if we go into the various committees on both sides of the Chamber.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it may be that other committees have been created here which are purely and simply fictions, but I for one think the proceeding has gone far enough and that no new committee should actually be created unless it is to constitute some valuable machinery.

Mr. GALLINGER. The committee has been created, and of course there is no remedy unless the action of the Senate shall be reconsidered, which I trust will not be done.

Mr. WILLIAMS and others addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield, and to whom?

Mr. BRIGGS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey where the resolution comes from.

Mr. BRIGGS. It comes from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the Senator from New Jersey to let the matter go over, if that is the case, because I am a member of that committee, and I am informed by my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], that he stands in the same attitude; we never heard of the resolution. I must have missed the notice that possibly was sent out to attend a meeting, and so did the Senator from Arkansas. We would like to have an opportunity to examine into it.

Mr. GALLINGER (to Mr. BRIGGS). Let it go over.

Mr. BRIGGS. I will let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will go over.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I would not be willing to let the statement of the Senator from Mississippi create the impression that I thought there was anything wrong done by the report of the chairman of the committee when he presented the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not intend that.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I take advantage of this opportunity to say that what has been recommended by the Senator from New Jersey is entirely in the line of the precedents of the Senate. Every Republican Member of the Senate has a chairmanship of a real or a nominal committee. It is the method of assigning to him sufficient clerical service that has obtained here for many years. There is no particular reason why it should not be done at this time. It is one of the prerogatives of the majority, and in nearly every instance it works out what is equitable and fair. There is nothing unjust about it, nothing extraordinary or unusual about it, that when it is properly understood will invoke the criticism of the strictest constructionist of committees here.

The matter can go back to the committee, and if nothing further is disclosed than has been brought out here I shall be very glad to unite with the chairman of the committee in favorably reporting the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not mean by my request that I myself will ultimately oppose the resolution. I do not know whether I shall or shall not. My object is only what I have explained, to get an opportunity to look into it and find out about it. I understand the Senator from New Jersey is perfectly willing to give us that opportunity.

I am not disposed to be hypercritical about the traditions and customs and routine of the Senate. A great deal might be said in criticism of the fact that there are a great many useless committees of which both majority and minority Members are chairmen. I realize that it is not worth while creating a tempest in a teapot. Probably it would be better to go along in the routine and let this follow the precedents. But I should like to look into it, and I will look into it as soon as the Senator from

New Jersey and I can get a proper opportunity. He will let me know when, and he will let the Senator from Arkansas know.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will not be further considered at this time, but will go to the calendar.

THE METAL SCHEDULE.

Mr. SIMMONS rose.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, just a moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. I desire to suggest to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], as we are about to take up one of the tariff bills, that relating to metal manufactures, that the Senate should hereafter return to meeting at 12 o'clock. There are Senators I know who desire to address the Senate on this bill, and with an adjournment until 2 o'clock they probably would not have an opportunity of doing so until a late hour. It is now 20 minutes after 3. I myself had desired to-day to follow the Senator from North Carolina. Of course it will be too late when he has finished. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has given notice that he will address the Senate to-morrow after the routine morning business is concluded. I do not know how long he will occupy the attention of the Senate, but I wish to give notice now that on Thursday morning after the routine business I will address the Senate on this same bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that there is a special order for Thursday—the employer's liability and workmen's compensation bill.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. STONE. Well, does that displace the regular order?

Mr. CULBERSON. Being a unanimous-consent agreement, it displaces everything.

Mr. STONE. Well, I ask the Chair if it displaces the regular order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unanimous-consent agreement provides that the bill therein referred to, Senate bill 5382, shall be taken up immediately after the routine morning business on Thursday, May 2, and proceeded with until disposed of. That would displace the unfinished business for that legislative day.

Mr. BACON. I would inquire if it is not true that the unanimous-consent agreement was made before the special order was made?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That also is correct.

Mr. STONE. I did not quite catch that.

Mr. BACON. The unanimous-consent order, which applies for Thursday, was made before this bill was made the unfinished business; so that for two reasons it would undoubtedly have precedence on Thursday.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. The unfinished business, then, ceases to be the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does for that day.

Mr. STONE. Does the Chair mean for the calendar or the legislative day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. For the legislative day.

Mr. STONE. Well, heaven only knows when we can take up the regular business again if that be true.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri addressed an inquiry to me, which I did not quite catch. Was it an inquiry as to the propriety of meeting at 12 o'clock instead of meeting at 2 o'clock hereafter?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I, of my own volition, have consulted with Senators on both sides of the Chamber this very morning about that matter, and the opinion seemed to be that we would not make any better progress meeting at 12 o'clock than we would at 2, for the reason that there are so many Senators engaged on important committee work. Personally I have no preference about it at all; but I would suggest to the Senator that perhaps it would be well for us to meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock, as there are two or three speeches to be delivered, and then see whether we think it desirable to continue doing so. If that would be agreeable to the Senator, I think we could have that arrangement made.

Mr. STONE. It is agreeable to me.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will make the motion if it is agreeable to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. It is agreeable to me to meet at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Of course, Mr. President, it has been the long custom of the Senate to meet at 12 o'clock. On motion of the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] at the beginning of this session it was agreed that the assembling of the Senate should be at 2 o'clock instead of at 12 o'clock; but that, we all understood, was temporary, and that when the business of the Senate became such that it would facilitate the business to do so, we would meet at 12 o'clock as formerly. The 2 o'clock meeting was all right in the early days of the session; but now we have reached the point, it seems to me, when we ought to meet earlier and to continue to meet earlier and when the hour of meeting should be 12 o'clock instead of 2 o'clock; so that these important bills, particularly the tariff bill, may be taken up and disposed of. If we meet at 2 o'clock, as we have been doing, it means two hours lost in the consideration of such measures.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Missouri if it would be agreeable to him to have the Senate adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock to-morrow to give us an opportunity to confer in reference to it?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the bill under consideration deals only with the metal schedule, and is one of a series of schedule bills upon which the Senate will be called upon to act at this session.

Speaking in general terms, this bill reduces the rates of the present law on metals and the manufactures thereof from an average ad valorem of about 35 per cent to an average of about 22 per cent, thereby, as its advocates contend, placing these duties substantially upon a revenue basis and allowing reasonable competition within the zone where foreign competition is not made impossible by transportation cost.

The bill transfers some articles now upon the dutiable list to the free list. By general designation the articles so transferred are iron ore, zinc ore, tungsten ore; bands for baling cotton, commonly known as cotton ties; wires for fencing, and baling wire; nails, tacks, brads, and such like articles; cash registers, typesetting machines, sewing machines, typewriters, and so forth.

The value of imports thus transferred to the free list, upon the basis of importations in the year 1911, amounts to $7,628,605, and the duties it is proposed to remit amounted in that year to $600,582.

Aside from the reduction of duties the most important difference between this bill and the Payne-Aldrich bill, which it is intended to supersede, is in the method providing for levying duties.

Duties under the present law are either specific or compound; that is, a specific rate with an ad valorem rate superadded.

The duties under this bill are all ad valorem. In other words, this bill assesses taxes upon the basis of the value or selling price of the thing taxed, while the present law assesses taxes upon the basis of the weight and quantity without regard to the quality or value of the thing taxed.

The controversy over the relative merits of specific and ad valorem duties is one of long standing in this country. It began more than three-quarters of a century ago. It has been an acutely disputed question in all of our tariff discussions and legislation—the advocates of protection insisting upon specific and the advocates of a tariff for revenue insisting upon ad valorem duties.

The objections now urged against this feature of the bill are substantially the same as those that have been made against the ad valorem system in every controversy over specific and ad valorem rates in connection with our tariff legislation from the beginning. Briefly these objections as stated.

First. An alleged uncertainty in the average of resulting revenues because of fluctuations in prices correspondingly increasing or reducing the amount of revenue derived therefrom.

Undoubtedly this method of assessing taxes is, to a more or less extent, obnoxious to this objection. It is a result, however, which is unavoidable, if taxes, either direct or indirect, are levied upon the basis of the value of the thing taxed.

Specific duties, though for a different reason, are subject to the same objection, as I think our experience with that method of imposing taxes abundantly shows. With specific duties, if importations were a fixed quantity from year to year, the revenues would, of course, always be the same.

But it is obvious that a specific duty which would afford no bar to importations when prices ranged high might, in many cases, be prohibitive when prices ranged low, thus cutting off all revenues from that source.

Speaking generally, it may be said where protection is the primary purpose of a tariff tax, specific duties naturally lend themselves, so to speak, to that purpose; and where the primary purpose of a tariff tax is revenue, ad valorem duties are best adapted to the accomplishment of that purpose. The present law is a protection measure and was framed with protection as its primary purpose, and naturally specific rates were adopted. The pending bill is a revenue measure. To raise revenue to pay the expenses of the Government is its primary purpose, and for that reason its authors prescribe ad valorem rates.

The next objection urged against this feature of the bill is the administrative difficulties growing out of the natural desire of importers to evade the payment of duties by undervaluations and the manifest difficulty of customs officials in circumventing frauds of this character.

Without attempting to minimize the seriousness of these difficulties in administration, it is obvious that frauds upon the revenue, probably equally as serious, may be perpetrated, and have been successfully perpetrated, with specific duties by underweighing. A notable illustration is found in the sugar-fraud cases, where, by underweighing, the Government was swindled out of millions of dollars by the Sugar Trust. The silk cases also furnish a well-known illustration.

But conceding, for the purposes of the argument, the full force of these objections to the ad valorem system, it must be admitted that they are less tenable as regards the iron and steel products than in the case of most other products, because the values of these products, especially the basic products of the industry, are in a sense standardized throughout the world and are not subject to violent fluctuations, and because reliable information as to world prices is readily obtainable.

While there are difficulties growing out of undervaluations under the one and underweighing under the other system, these are administrative difficulties which, under our stringent laws against frauds of this kind, can be overcome or reduced to a minimum through honest and capable administration; and in legislating upon this subject Congress has the right to presume that the executive branch of the Government will provide for such an administration.

But, Mr. President, every objection of this character that can be urged against either specific or ad valorem duties can be urged with equal force against the compound duties with which the present law is literally saturated.

In the language of a distinguished authority upon the tariff—

> If ad valorem rates induce undervaluations and make the administration of the customs laws difficult and expensive, compound rates must have the same result; and if specific rates are calculated to deceive the consumer and make the worse appear the better rate, surely a compound duty is no less guilty.
> The ad valorem system, easier to be understood by the taxpayer, immediately responsive to fluctuating values and automatically keeping pace with changing conditions in the manufacture and market of the product, free from all the objections to the specific system and from nearly all the faults of the compound, we believe to be the most satisfactory to all parties affected.
> To say that such a system can not be successfully enforced by the Government is to indict the revenue officials with incompetence and inefficiency, which the friends of the compound rates dare not charge without confessing the failure of the present law to result in an honest collection of the duties laid under its compound system.

INEQUALITIES OF SPECIFIC RATES.

Mr. President, while these questions of administrative difficulties and possible frauds in the enforcement of our tariff laws are undoubtedly important, they are of but minor consequence compared with the injustice, inequality, and the unfairness of assessing an article for taxation upon the basis of quantity, or weight, or measure without reference to value or quality.

The inevitable effect of assessing duties upon the basis of quantity instead of value under the present law is to discriminate against the cheaper and coarser articles covered by the tariff which the poor consume in favor of the finer and more costly articles which the rich consume. It was repeatedly shown in the discussions of the Payne-Aldrich bill that the specific duties of that bill taxed the coarser grades of woolen and cotton goods, flannels and carpets which the poor buy much higher than the finer grades which the rich buy.

In his great report upon the Walker bill, Robert J. Walker, then Secretary of the Treasury, in denouncing the minimum and specific duties carried in the law which that bill superseded, declared that these duties exacted annually over $5,000,000 from the poorer classes by raising the duty on cheaper articles above what they would have been if the duties had been assessed upon the basis of actual value.

Mr. President, equality is a fundamental principle of popular government. Whatever does violence to that principle is undemocratic as well as unjust. A tax upon importations, upon the sole basis of quantity, is an unequal tax, an unjust tax, and an undemocratic tax.

It is as obnoxious to the fundamental principle of equality as would be direct taxation upon the basis of quantity. It is just as unequal as would be a State tax assessing lands upon the basis of acreage without reference to location, fertility, or productiveness. It is just as unequal as would be a State tax assessing a draft horse at the same price as a thoroughbred because they were both horses. It is just as unequal as would be a State tax assessing the humble cottage of the laboring man at the same price as the costly mansion of the rich because they were both houses. Direct taxes levied upon such a basis would be intolerable, and indirect taxes levied upon the same basis while differing in degree nowise differ in principle.

THE BILL MEETS THE DEMAND FOR ADDITIONAL REDUCTION.

Mr. President, when the national conventions of the two parties met in 1908 there was an overwhelming demand, coming from the rank and file of both of these parties, for relief from intolerable burdens laid upon the people by a tariff framed in the interest of special privilege, and which, while enormously augmenting the wealth and power of the few, restricted the opportunities of the many and advanced the cost of living beyond the incomes of the normally thrifty and well-to-do.

The Republican Party in response to that demand solemnly pledged, if again intrusted with authority, to remedy the evils complained of, at least to the extent of limiting the power of combination to arbitrarily fix prices by admitting competition from the outside when prices were raised above the margin of a reasonable profit. Feigning to redeem that pledge, the Republican Congress of 1909 passed the Payne-Aldrich bill, reenacting in effect the Dingley law, with a few minor changes, which gave little or no relief to the people on the one hand and on the other hand took from its beneficiaries but little which was regarded by them as worth retaining. The substituted act was, in effect and substance, so nearly the same as the one it superseded that the question of whether it operated to revise the tariff downward or upward was at the time of its consideration and passage, and still is, a matter of dispute.

Without characterizing that measure as a repudiation of the Republican platform promise and a betrayal of the people's trust, as many of the aforetime leaders of that party from the housetop have proclaimed it to be and are still vociferously proclaiming it to be, the Nation-wide agitation for a new revision and a new deal which set in before the ink upon the President's signature of approval was dry, culminating in the rout and overthrow of the Republican Party in the House of Representatives and the elevation to power in that branch of Congress of a party pledged to reduce the tariff to a competition basis, clearly and unmistakably signifies the deep dissatisfaction and resentment of the popular electorate, and manifests their inexorable determination that the power to impose taxes on imports to raise revenue to maintain the Government shall not be used so as to defeat the purpose for which that power was granted, and to confer upon the American producer the right to tax to the full limit of the fraudulent levy the domestic consumer of his product.

Confronted by this unmistakable and overwhelming dissatisfaction with the so-called Payne-Aldrich revision of 1909 and the irrepressible demand that there shall be another and effective revision, the opponents of tariff reduction have ceased to openly resist that demand and are hiding their real opposition behind the pretense that Congress can not safely legislate on the tariff without the information and advice of the Tariff Board. The President himself, without openly combating the desirability of a more effective revision, suggested the schedule plan of revision and the selection of those schedules against which there was the greatest complaint.

At the special session of 1911 the Democratic House met the President's suggestions and sent him a number of schedule bills, one of them reducing certain duties which he had himself denounced as indefensible, and all of them making only moderate average reductions and carrying duties, which, while sufficiently competitive to yield a fair revenue return, were yet high enough to cover the difference in the labor cost here and abroad, where there is such a difference, and giving the American producer every opportunity to supply the home market consistent with the rights of the consumer and compatible with the revenue needs of the Government.

Upon every one of these bills the President put the seal of his disapproval, and, taking refuge behind his Tariff Board, gave the country to understand he would approve no act reducing the Payne-Aldrich rates until there was a report by that board upon the schedule involved.

Sirs, this is the first time in the history of the Republic—and may it be the last—that the executive branch of the Government has assumed to impeach the competency of the legislative branch to discharge the duties intrusted to it by the Constitution and the people acting in pursuance of it, without information first had and obtained from an executive board. It is an attack upon the foundation principle of our representative system of government.

If the near 400 Members of the House of Representatives and the more than 90 Members of the Senate, selected by the people to make laws for their government, do not possess sufficient information, knowledge, and capacity to legislate justly and wisely about that subject which most nearly affects their pecuniary welfare, and which has been more exhaustively studied and investigated than any other subject in the domain of legislation—if the justice and wisdom of the demand of the people, if the justice and wisdom of the action of their chosen representatives in their efforts to comply with those demands must wait upon the finding and report of a board selected by the President, our theory of representative government is unsound in its most essential quality.

Mr. President, at the exact time in our national life when the right of the people to rule—when the right of the people to determine and direct legislation upon their own initiative, without interference or dictation from President, board, bureau, or department—is most insistently asserted, they are told, and their Representatives in Congress are told, that any legislation to carry out their will and instructions, and to keep the ante-election pledges made to them with respect thereto, will be vetoed, unless it squares with the findings and report of an advisory board, and that all action for their relief from intolerable exactions must wait upon the masterly inactivity of that board.

The attitude of the President in this matter is a startling answer to the demands of the people, and is reactionary to the very last degree.

Mr. President, when the Payne-Aldrich bill—a bill framed by the friends of protection, and framed, pretendedly at least, with a view to carrying out the Republican platform definition of the measure of protection the industries of the country were entitled to receive—was under consideration by Congress there was no contention, so far as I recall, either on the part of the President or those in charge of that bill, that Congress could not wisely and safely legislate upon that subject without an investigation by an outside board to determine the facts with reference to the complex standard prescribed in that platform.

The absence of such a report was not then considered a reason for nonaction. No such contention was then made by the managers of that bill. No such contention was made by the President when the bill was presented to him for his approval. But now that it is sought to revise the tariff along Democratic lines in the interest of the people and not to suit the interests, measuring duties by the well-known and definite needs of the Government instead of by the uncertain and variable requirements of a platform formula, the opponents of reductions, including the President, set up the plea and pretense that it is dangerous to change a rate upon any article or schedule, however high, prohibitive, or monopolistic it may be, until it has been first scientifically ascertained what it cost the foreigner to make such articles.

As bearing upon the bona fides of this contention, it is significant that the claim that we are without sufficiently accurate and reliable information as to the cost of production is not made by those Republican Senators who, though protectionists, are demanding and supporting reductions according to the Republican platform formula, but is made only by that wing of the Republican Party responsible for the sham revision of 1909, and whom the people suspect of being opposed to any reductions whatever of existing duties.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask if in the tariff act of August 5, 1909, known as the Payne-Aldrich bill, provision was not made for the Tariff Board?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, yes; I think so—that is, for an executive board.

Mr. SMOOT. For the Tariff Board.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. The duties of that board were to collect for the information of Congress certain data, and in the law itself it is specifically stated that they should report within a certain time as to the wool schedule.

I would also ask if the Senator himself did not vote for that amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Is the Senator from Utah through?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not recall how I voted upon the particular amendment to which the Senator refers—the amendment creating the executive board—but there is nothing in the law or in the provision of the law to which the Senator refers providing that the Congress shall wait upon the report of that board before it proceeds to revise the tariff; and if there were any such provision in the law the Senator knows it would be utterly nugatory, especially in the face of the overwhelming demand that this revision shall go forward, as manifested by the result of the last election.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand, but I want to call the Senate's attention to the fact that the board was created at the very time that the bill passed Congress, and the duty of that board was to collect testimony and information for the use of Congress in the future consideration of tariff bills.

I am perfectly aware that the Congress need not take any notice or take into consideration any information obtained or presented to Congress by that board; but it was created for that purpose, and those who believe in a revision of the tariff now, along protective lines, believe in following the information submitted to Congress by that board.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. GORE. I think the Senator from Utah is mistaken in the statement that the provision in the Payne-Aldrich law requires the collection by the board of data for the use of Congress.

Mr. SIMMONS. To aid the President in administering the maximum and minimum provisions of that act.

Mr. GORE. I think it originally stood as stated by the Senator from Utah, but that was stricken out on the motion of the then Senator from Maine, Mr. Hale, and provision was made for a report as to the maximum and minimum provisions of the act. The requirement that the board should report on the woolen schedule I think was inserted in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. SMOOT. It was in relation to the same subject matter, and the amendment was offered by the senior Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, my recollection is distinct that the board was created exclusively to obtain information for the President with reference to the maximum and minimum clauses of the law and that some other general purpose was added afterwards. But it was not provided that the board should report to Congress, and it never has, except only to the President.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is correct. The report was for the President's special information in administering the law, as I stated before.

Mr. SMOOT. That was collected by the board.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator from Utah will read the provision in the act of 1909 and will inform those Senators who are here now, but who were not here then, what happened in the Senate in respect to that particular provision, and that especially will he not forget the statement of the Senator from Maine, Mr. Hale, that it was not intended that the appropriation made for the Tariff Board should be expended for the purpose of obtaining information for the use of Congress in making future schedules.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that that was the individual expression of the senior Senator from Maine, but the Senate did not take that position, nor did it agree with him.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Utah will read what the law says upon that subject, I think all confusion about this will disappear. The provisions as to the investigations of the Tariff Board, so far as schedules are concerned, were made under the appropriations act of 1910, wherein the authority of the board was very materially enlarged and changed.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. WARREN. I was about to say that a change had taken place between the date on which the Senator from Maine made that observation and the present. The board was enlarged in numbers, its duties were somewhat enlarged, and the date of the report was as the Senator from Texas has said, the board to report on certain articles to the Congress.

Mr. CUMMINS. That was almost a year later.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; it was.

Mr. SMOOT. It was not a year later when the Senator from Texas introduced that resolution.

Mr. CUMMINS. But a year later than the passage of the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true as to the enlargement of the powers of the board and the increase in the number.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Utah will read it even as finally agreed upon in conference he will find that it is very doubtful whether under the authority then given the board could make an investigation and furnish information looking to future changes in the law. The purpose was of course to enable the board to apply the maximum and minimum feature of the act of 1909.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator from Iowa think that any Senator at the time that provision was adopted supposed the purpose and effect of it would be to prevent any future tariff revision except upon the report and in accordance with the report of the board?

Mr. CUMMINS. At that time the Senator from Indiana, Mr. Beveridge, was leading the fight for the Tariff Board, and we who believed in somewhat lower duties were very anxious that there should be an independent, nonpartisan or bipartisan tribunal created for the investigation of these questions. After some conference with those who were leading the other side of the controversy he thought he would accomplish something by securing the executive board which afterwards was appointed, but he was very much disappointed, as we all were, when the report was made by the Finance Committee, or by those who were speaking for it, conferring authority upon the President's board. I think the Senator from Utah will remember exactly the history of that time.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to read in confirmation of what I have said the clause of section 2 of the act of 1909 on this very subject:

> To secure information to assist the President in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by this section, and the officers of the Government in the administration of the customs laws, the President is hereby authorized to employ such persons as may be required.

Showing that it was not intended at all that this board should be useful to the Congress, but confined it to information they should furnish the President to enable him to execute the provisions of section 2, which were the maximum and minimum provisions of the law, and also to aid certain customs officers in the administration of the customs laws of the United States.

Mr. WARREN. That was all changed in the later law.

Mr. SMOOT. But the act of June 30, 1910, reads as follows:

> The Tariff Board, if established by law, shall make report to each House of the Congress on the wool and woolen schedule not later than the first Monday in December, 1911.
> To enable the President to continue, by the employment of accountants and experts from official and private life, such officials to receive no compensation beyond their official salaries, to more effectively inquire into the methods of transacting the public business of the Government in the several executive departments and other Government establishments, with the view of inaugurating new or changing old methods of transacting such public business so as to attain greater efficiency and economy therein, and to ascertain and recommend to Congress what changes in law may be necessary to carry into effect such results of his inquiry as can not be carried into effect by Executive action alone, and for each and every purpose necessary hereunder, including the employment of personal services at Washington or elsewhere, $75,000, together with any unexpended balance of the appropriation made for this purpose for the fiscal year 1911.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Utah said it was the act of June 30, 1912. It was the act of 1911.

Mr. WARREN. It was the regular sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. SMOOT. It is the act "making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes."

Mr. CUMMINS. If I may interrupt further, I do not want anything I have said to lead anyone to believe that I do not value the investigation of a board of experts into the facts of this subject. I only wanted to keep history straight, because my fellow Republicans in 1909 were as much opposed to a Tariff Board reporting to Congress and furnishing information to Congress as they now seem to be in favor of such a board. I was in favor of the board then, I am in favor of it now, and I earnestly hope, until we are supplied with such a board as I believe ought to exist, that we can secure the advantage of the labors of the employees of the President.

I will answer the question put to me by the Senator from North Carolina with regard to the propriety of waiting for the revision of any schedule of the tariff until we have a report of such a board, when I come to consider the subject to-morrow. I will say, however, in a sentence, that of course I am not in favor under all circumstances of waiting until such a board reports upon the subject. The report of such a board is not the end, it is simply a means to the end, and I am not willing to abandon the end because it seems impossible to pursue that particular course at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hope I may be permitted to go on. I think we have sufficiently thrashed out that phase of the discussion.

Mr. President, denying, as I do, that Congress stands in need of any Tariff Board information, as a basis of safe legislation, I submit that even from the standpoint of those who maintain otherwise there is less need for such information in the case of the metal schedule than probably any other of the 14 schedules covered in the existing law, not only because the world prices, especially of the basic products of this industry, are reasonably well standardized and exceptionally exempt from fluctuations, but because of the many investigations and reports that have been made with respect to prices and wages in this industry by different bureaus of the Government and by official as well as nonofficial experts, our sources of information and enlightenment are exceptionally full and plenary. We have elaborate reports upon this subject of the British, German, and American steel associations.

We have the illuminating report of Mr. Pepper, special agent of the Department of Commerce and Labor, who made an investigation of the German and English iron and steel industry with a view to obtaining detailed information of the cost of the various manufactures in those countries.

We have the report of the Bureau of Manufactures and Labor, and the publications of the Geological Survey, with detailed customs statistics; and we have the sworn testimony of numerous experts in the trade recently given before legislative committees of both branches of Congress.

Mr. President, this bill is not framed along protection lines. Its authors and sponsors did not recognize any obligation or right of the Government by legislation of any kind to guarantee to the industries of the country a satisfactory or reasonable or any kind of a profit.

Its purpose is not to protect the dealers in and producers of the articles enumerated in their profits by stifling competition, but to raise revenue to pay the expenses of the Government, and to this end it prescribes rates that will admit of reasonable competition.

The only way the Government can realize revenues by a tariff tax is through importations. If there are no importations there will be no revenue, whatever the rate of duty may be. If the duties are excessively low there will be importations, but the Government will realize little revenue; if the duties are excessively high there will be no importations and no revenue.

The revenue needs of the Government are great. Besides the ordinary expenses of administration, the Government, in line with the general spirit of progress now animating our people, is doing within its legitimate and sometimes exclusive domain great things at great cost for the development, utilization, and conservation of our great national resources, and the money must, in the present state of our laws, be raised in chief part through tariff taxation.

To raise this large amount of money the rate of duties must of necessity be fixed on a high revenue-producing basis. The average rate fixed in this bill is about 22 per cent, as against 35 per cent under existing law.

Whether a tariff on importations is made for protection or for revenue, it operates, to the extent of the duties imposed, to exclude importations and protect the domestic producer against foreign competition.

In levying duties for revenue, while we should be mindful of the facts as to foreign competition and should so adjust them that they may incidentally safeguard the American producer against transparent and otherwise insurmountable inequalities and enable him, on a basis of fair prices for his products, to reasonably dominate the domestic market, it should not be forgotten that the primary purpose of taxation by the Government is to raise revenue for its honest and economical administration. This bill is framed along these lines.

OBJECTIONS TO THE BILL BY THE OPPONENTS OF THE MEASURE.

Outside of those I have already mentioned, the only ground of opposition, so far as I have heard, to this bill is the contention that on account of our alleged high wage scale we can not compete with the foreign producers under the lowered rates it provides.

Some of the representatives of the manufacturers who appeared before the Finance Committee of the Senate did not contend against any reduction, but protested that the cut made was too great; but the most of them contended for the present rate, and practically all of them based their opposition upon the alleged lower labor cost of competing countries and insisted that the industry was entitled to tariff protection against this disadvantage, and that the rates carried in this bill were not sufficiently high to accomplish this purpose.

Putting aside for the present all discussion of the controversy between the advocates of a tariff for revenue and a tariff for protection as to the relative merits of these two policies, in answer to this contention universally advanced and relied on by those opposing the bill, I will attempt to prove—

1. That steel and iron and most of the manufactures of these products can be produced, and are produced, as cheaply here, and in some cases more cheaply, as anywhere else in the world.

2. That, without regard to any difference in per diem wages paid in this industry here and elsewhere, the actual labor cost is no greater here than in either England, Germany, or Belgium, the countries against which the producers of these products demand protection upon the ground of cheaper labor cost; and I shall contend, if there is any such difference, that the duties carried in this bill more than cover that difference—indeed, that in some instances they more than cover the entire labor cost.

3. I shall contend that, under the present excessive protection, the producers of these products are making abnormally high profits, to the great wrong and injury of the American consumer, and that their laborers do not share in these superadded profits, but are in large part both underpaid and underfed.

4. I shall attempt to show that our manufacturers of these products are now competing, upon a basis of fair profits, with the world, and that under this bill they will be able to continue to dominate this market placed upon a high basis of profit.

5. I shall contend that the rates fixed in this bill, while potentially competitive, will only to a reasonable extent increase the opportunity of foreign competition, and that there is not the slightest foundation for the claim so persistently and loudly made that at once the country will be flooded with foreign goods and the domestic industry destroyed.

Finally, I shall contend that these reductions are demanded not only in the interest of the consumer but in the interest of the expansion of our international trade, a consideration of primary importance if our industrial expansion is to attain to the potentialities of American genius, capacity, opportunity, and advantage.

Mr. President, before proceeding to the consideration of the program of discussion I have outlined I think it proper and that it will probably be helpful to make a few explanatory observations touching the general conditions with regard to our export, import, and domestic trade and production of iron and steel and the limitation, on account of transportation charges, of foreign competition in this industry either under this bill or with absolute free trade in these commodities.

Mr. President, the commodities covered in this bill, for convenience of discussion, may be divided into two parts, namely, the coarser and bulkier articles and the finer and lighter articles.

The domestic production of these commodities amounts to something over two and a half billion dollars. Of this amount the bulkier articles, such as rolled, forged, and other classified products of iron and steel, tin plate, pig iron, and wire amount to about $1,500,000,000 or something near three-fifths of the whole.

On account of the heavy cost of transportation of these bulkier products the zone of possible foreign competition even under free trade would be very limited. Freight charges make foreign competition in these products impossible in all that vast region lying between the Allegheny and Rocky Mountains. Potential competition in these bulky and heavy products would, under any tariff conditions, be confined to within a possible radius of 50 or 75 miles of our Atlantic and Pacific seaports.

Under present duties there is now a slight competition along our seacoasts, as is shown by the fact that there was imported last year $20,000,000 of these heavy products. With the reductions provided in this bill the zone of possible competition will be extended to the extent that the remitted duty will pay the cost of transportation.

It is estimated that this increase of importation will probably amount to about $8,000,000, being less than one-half of 1 per cent upon the domestic production. Yet, Mr. President, with only $20,000,000 worth of imports against a billion and a half of domestic production, the manufacturers of this product in the interest, as I shall contend, of absolutely prohibitive rates, come to Congress and protest that if we reduce the rates so that $8,000,000 more may come in their industry will be destroyed.

The average importations of all the commodities embraced in this bill during the last two years amounted to about $62,000,000. It is estimated that the proposed reductions will bring an increase of between $10,000,000 and $15,000,000, our production being about two billions and a half.

While the reduction in duties proposed in this bill is moderate and the resulting increase in probable imports will be small, it is believed that the increased opportunity for outside competition, though slight, will tend somewhat to break the trust combination which now exists in this industry and to force the producers of these products to reduce, to some extent at least, the excessive prices which now obtain.

In opposing this moderate reduction and this slight addition to the present volume of imports, now almost negligible, while exporting and selling abroad in competition with the world $230,000,000 worth of their output, the representatives of this industry show that what they want is not so much protection, but inhibition, against outside interference with their control of the domestic markets, and that higher protection rates are sought not because this industry can not compete with foreign competition in this market, as it does in every other market, but to safeguard the monopoly which enables it to exploit the American market.

Mr. President, it is my opinion, after a somewhat close study of this question, that iron and steel can be made as cheaply in this country as abroad. This I think is also true with most of the manufactures of iron and steel, but I have not a doubt, where there is a cost difference against us, that the revenue duties carried in this bill will more than measure that difference.

I do not know who are better capable of determining whether iron and steel can be produced as cheaply here as elsewhere than the men who have been most prominent in building up that industry in this country.

CARNEGIE.

The name of Andrew Carnegie is indissolubly associated with it. He has accumulated such a vast fortune out of it that his name has become a household word throughout the land—a fortune so stupendous that he finds it difficult to give away the income from it.

Speaking out of his abundant knowledge of conditions here as well as abroad of this industry, this great iron master, as he is sometimes called, has repeatedly declared under oath and otherwise that these products could be made as cheaply here as anywhere in the world and they needed no protection, and that the duty could now be abolished without hurt to the industry.

Mr. President, I will not read what Mr. Carnegie has said upon this subject heretofore, but I will ask permission to incorporate it in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Maine in the chair). Without objection, leave is granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

After the Civil War Congress sent for the manufacturers and explained that it was ready to "protect" steel, and 30 per cent duty was imposed. Steel rails, all imported, then cost $90 per ton; the duty was $28. To-day the price is $28 per ton, home production, and the duty $4. No foreign supply is needed. The writer has been before several congressional committees upon the tariff question, but never to ask an increase, always stating that reductions in duties could be made. Testifying before the present tariff was passed, I stated that the steel duty could now be abolished, which gave many people the impression that I had changed my views because I was no longer an interested party. On the contrary, I may cite a letter that appeared in the New York Times of December 28, 1908, from Charles Stewart Smith, of the New York Chamber of Commerce, saying that he heard me "tell President McKinley during his first term that steel no longer needed protection." The infant industry has grown to be a giant; protection has done its work.

E. H. GARY.

Mr. SIMMONS. Another bright and particular star among the captains of this industry is Mr. E. H. Gary, chairman of the board of directors of the United States Steel Corporation. In his testimony before the House committee investigating the Steel Trust Mr. Gary swore that his company was selling its manufactures in South America in competition with foreign countries at about the same price obtained in this country. Of course, if the foreigner can produce for less than we can he could undersell us in South America, where tariff conditions are equal.

Mr. E. H. Gary, when recently testifying before the committee on the investigation of the United States Steel Corporation, informed the committee (hearings, p. 95) that—

So far as we are concerned in this country, we get pretty nearly the same price from those countries all the time—

Countries to which iron and steel products are regularly exported, particularly South America—

I think, so far as foreign manufacturers are concerned, they get higher prices from the South American countries and the other countries that you speak of, at times at least, than they do in their own country. * * * One year the average price of our export rails was 27 cents a ton higher than the domestic price.

The fact that we are able to sell there, where there is no freight, or tariff advantage, where probably the freight rates are against us, at a fair price is conclusive evidence, Mr. President, that we need no protection, so far as the labor cost is concerned, against the foreigner whom we meet in those markets.

WILLIAM E. COREY.

Mr. William Ellis Corey, ex-president of the United States Steel Corporation, a great authority, thoroughly familiar with conditions in this country, in an interview published in the New York Evening Post, February 21, 1912, just before sailing for Europe, said there was no reason why there should be any alarm about the talk of reducing the tariff on steel, because this country can produce steel as cheap as others. He declared that the United States exported steel products to 40 different countries, and that this was sufficient evidence that we could produce steel cheaper here than any other country.

He declares that the United States exported steel products to 40 different countries, and that this was sufficient evidence that we could produce steel cheaper here, to use his language, than they could in those countries—cheaper, Mr. President, because we could not meet that foreign competition with freight rates against us unless we were able to produce it cheaper than it is produced elsewhere.

I ask that I may be permitted, without reading, to insert in the RECORD the statement of Mr. Corey to which I referred a moment ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request is granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

[From New York Evening Post, Feb. 21, 1912.]

COREY ON THE STEEL TRADE.

William Ellis Corey, ex-president of the United States Steel Corporation, said to-day before he sailed for Europe on the Olympic that there was no reason why there should be alarm about the talk of reducing the tariff on steel, because this country could produce steel cheaper than any other. He declared that the United States exported steel products to 40 different countries. * * *

"The country need not be apprehensive over a possible reduction in steel duties," said Corey. "The United States can produce steel cheaper than any other country, and the fact that we now export all kinds of steel products to over 40 different countries in every quarter of the world is sufficient evidence of this fact."

Mr. SIMMONS. I find in the report of the United States Industrial Commission, volume 1, a most illuminating and convincing statement upon this question in the testimony of Mr. Charles S. Guthrie, president of the American Steel Hoop Co. I do not think it has been read before in any of the debates we have had upon this question, and I want to read that part of Mr. Guthrie's testimony, which is especially pertinent to the question I am now debating.

In the course of his examination he was asked:

How do you manage to undersell the Englishman in the English market?

It seems, Mr. President, that we are able to undersell them in their own market.

A. Cut his prices, usually.

* * * * * * *

Q. In ordinary times you can keep up American wages and beat the Englishman in his own market.—A. Without the slightest doubt; we can whip him and make money.

Q. When you take the general run, you think Americans are able to compete with the English and Germans in their own market?—A. Without the slightest doubt, and make a profit.

Q. You can lay down steel rails, for instance, in China cheaper than an English or Belgian or German firm?—A. We are doing it right along.

Q. And build bridges in Egypt, I suppose?—A. Yes; and everything else. The truth of the matter is, the Creator of all things has been good to us. We have the raw material, the coal, the coke, the ability, the intelligence, and we are pushing it for all it is worth; and I think it is only a question of time, and a very short time, when we shall control the iron and steel markets of the world. I have one partner over there in the Northeastern Steel Co. and another with Dorman, Long & Co., and they have absolutely given up the idea of competing with us if it comes to a close fight.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. OLIVER. I should like the Senator to state the date at which this testimony was given.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it was in October, 1899.

Mr. OLIVER. In 1899?

Mr. SIMMONS. In October, 1899.

Mr. OLIVER. This is the testimony of Mr. Guthrie?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Guthrie has been dead for about 10 years.

Mr. SIMMONS. That gives him sufficient time to die. I am glad that before dying he made this valuable admission.

Mr. OLIVER. Conditions were very different in 1899 from what they now are.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; they are a great deal better for the American manufacturer now than they then were, I imagine.

Mr. OLIVER. I beg the Senator's pardon. They are not anything like as good for the American manufacturer. Furthermore, I knew Mr. Guthrie very well. He was a very enthusiastic individual, and when he got to talking he was a little like Mr. Schwab.

Mr. SIMMONS. He talked mighty well and talked mighty sensibly before the Industrial Commission, in what I have read. I am glad to have the testimony of the Senator from Pennsylvania, who knew this gentleman, as to his character.

But, Mr. President, we have an official finding with respect to the labor cost of pig iron, both in Germany, England, and in this country, made by a special agent of the Department of Commerce and Labor, who was sent to Europe for the purpose of making a thorough investigation of this question. I refer to the report of Mr. Charles M. Pepper.

If the facts found in the report of Mr. Pepper are true, they would seem to be conclusive in this controversy.

The question involved in this controversy was over labor costs here and abroad. I shall give the substance of Mr. Pepper's findings. I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that this report by Mr. Pepper was made in 1908. If the Senator finds any comfort in the fact that Mr. Guthrie's lucid statement was made in 1899, a time when he says conditions in the iron industry were better than they are now, I do not think——

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator did not understand me to say that the conditions were better.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, different. I will change that if the Senator desires it.

Mr. OLIVER. Different. In 1899, I will say for the information of the Senator, that the labor cost in America was lower than it was ever before or ever has been since. In addition to that——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, that was about three years after the Dingley law went into effect, I think.

Mr. STONE. Two years.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Missouri is correct—about two years after the Dingley law went into effect—a law, we have been told, that worked an immediate transformation for the betterment of the industries of the country.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, that law undoubtedly worked a very great transformation and it brought about a very great increase in the prosperity of the country and in the wages of the working people, but in 1898 and 1899 business had not yet quite recovered; it was just beginning to recover from the depression caused by four years of Democratic rule, during which four years the Wilson tariff law had been enacted. As a result of that depression wages were very low; the condition of the iron and steel business as to raw material was phenomenal. They were bringing ore down from the northern mines at the lowest possible cost. The ore was running an average of at least from 60 to 62 per cent iron, where to-day the ore coming there averages very little more than 50 per cent, which means that every ship that brings ore down is carrying at least 20 per cent more of waste material on which freight must be paid and for which labor must be paid at a higher rate. There never was a time in the history of this country when iron and steel could be produced so cheaply as they could from 1897 until about 1900, when costs began gradually to go up, and they have been going up ever since.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand the position of the Senator to be that it now costs more to produce iron and steel than it ever did before?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not say that it costs more than it ever did before, but it costs more than it did at any time since the manufacture of steel has expanded.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know that the Senator understands me; but do I understand the Senator is contending that the labor cost of producing iron and steel is now greater than it has ever before been?

Mr. OLIVER. I say that the labor cost of producing iron and steel is very much greater now than it was in 1899.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is that the result of an increase in wages?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes; an increase.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall be glad to have the Senator remain here until I get to that point, and I think I shall be able, probably, to satisfy him that the increase in wages of the steel and iron industry in the portion of the country where there has been an increase does not justify any such statement.

Mr. OLIVER. I will say——

Mr. SIMMONS. I think I shall be able to show the Senator that he is mistaken in that statement.

Mr. OLIVER. I think I heard Judge Gary state in the Senator's hearing before the Committee on Finance that as to the United States Steel Corporation since its organization the average advance had been, I think, about 80 per cent. I suppose the Senator from North Carolina was in the committee at the time. I was present.

Mr. SIMMONS. What corporation is the Senator from Pennsylvania talking about?

Mr. OLIVER. I am talking about the United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Who said that? I did not catch the Senator's remark.

Mr. OLIVER. Judge Gary said that. I think the Senator, if he will refer to the testimony, will find that his only objection—I think the testimony of Judge Gary has been cited with approval by the Senator from North Carolina——

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no such statement in any testimony of Judge Gary which I have read. Such increases in wages—and they have been slight—as have been made were not voluntary but forced by labor organizations.

Mr. OLIVER. I think, if the Senator will read Judge Gary's testimony, he will find that statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not recall Judge Gary's statement before the Senate Finance Committee; the statement I read is from the House hearings. But, Mr. President, that is aside from the question.

Mr. OLIVER. I beg pardon. The statement to which I refer was made before the Interstate Commerce Committee, and not before the Finance Committee. I was mistaken on that point.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is aside from the question. I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania, when I read the testimony of Mr. Guthrie given in 1899, objected on the ground that conditions then were different from conditions now. I am now going to read from the official report of an officer of that department of the Government whose duty it is to study and investigate this question, which was made in 1908, which brings the thing up to date.

Mr. OLIVER. Now the Senator is beginning to talk business.

REPORT OF CHARLES M. PEPPER, SPECIAL AGENT DEPARTMENT COMMERCE AND LABOR.

Mr. SIMMONS. According to Mr. Pepper, who made this investigation of the German and English iron and steel industry and also the industry in the United States in 1908, the cost of producing iron in Germany and Belgium is found to be as follows. I am not going to read from the report, Mr. President, but I am simply going to give the net result of his findings:

In Germany the average lowest cost was $12.85.

Mr. STONE. Per ton?

Mr. SIMMONS. Per ton of pig iron. The average highest cost was $13.65, and the total average cost $13.25.

In England the average lowest cost was $9.92; the average highest cost, $13.45; total average cost, $11.69.

REPORT OF H. K. SMITH, COMMISSIONER OF CORPORATIONS.

The United States Commissioner of Corporations in his recent report, published, I think, last January, estimates the lowest cost of production in this country, namely, in the Birmingham district at $10.02 a ton, which is below the lowest cost of Germany and but 10 cents per ton above the lowest cost in England. He estimates the highest cost in the United States at $13.76; the average lowest and highest at $11.89—lower than Germany's average, and only 20 cents per ton higher than the English average.

Mr. President, if that report is to be relied upon, there is practically no difference in the cost of producing a ton of pig iron between this country and England. Whether you compare the lowest cost, that of the Cleveland district in England, with the lowest cost in this country, that at Birmingham, or compare the highest cost in this country with the highest cost in England and Germany, the rates are substantially the same. That is the finding of this Government official.

CHARLES S. SCHWAB, PRESIDENT BETHLEHEM STEEL WORKS.

One of the most conspicuous figures in connection with the iron and steel industry in the United States is Mr. Charles Schwab, and I shall have much to say about Mr. Schwab before I get through, because we have had him before the Committee on Finance, and my good friend the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and myself had a great deal of enjoyment in our cross-examinations of him.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator from North Carolina passes to his examination of Mr. Schwab's testimony, I desire to ask him whether he has looked into the market price of the various kinds of pig iron abroad as compared with the market price in our own country?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not investigated that phase of the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not know whether or not the Senator had collected that information.

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

Mr. CUMMINS. The truth is——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit, practically the whole objection made before the Finance Committee to this proposed reduction was upon the contention as to the alleged difference in the labor cost here and abroad, and I am trying to meet that argument.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. SIMMONS. Because that argument constitutes the basis of the objection, I have not taken up the other question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I simply want to say, in this connection, that the average price of pig iron abroad in the last year has been greater than in the United States.

The SIMMONS. The average price?

Mr. CUMMINS. The average selling price of pig iron has been greater in England than in the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not the data, but I will say that your statement is confirmed by my general information of the subject. That has been my impression from general reading, but I have not particularly investigated the specific question of present prices of the products abroad as compared with those here.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I have sent for the figures, and I will have them here in a moment, so that we can learn exactly what is the cost in Germany, in England, and in the United States; but I want to say in this connection—and I suppose the Senator from Iowa will admit—that there never has been a time in all the history of England when pig iron has been so high as it has been in the last nine months, and there never has been a time in the history of the United States since, I suppose 1898, when the price has been so low.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator, in making the statement that there never has been a time in the history of England when prices were higher than during the last nine months, does not advert to the fact that the testimony I have offered the Senate was taken in 1908.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not referring to the Senator's statement as to the cost. I referred to what it is selling for in England to-day, and I have stated the absolute fact.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Utah agrees with me, I am sure, in my statement that the selling price of pig iron abroad in the last year has been higher than the selling price in the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I understood the Senator from Utah to admit.

Mr. SMOOT. At times, Mr. President, that is true, but not upon the average. I have the quotations here for every week, if the Senator wants to know them.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is the Senator from Utah able to assure the Senate that the present high range of prices will not continue?

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, I can assure the Senator——

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator want us to legislate upon the idea that they may not continue without giving us any reason for supposing that they will not continue?

Mr. SMOOT. The only assurance I can give the Senator is that history generally repeats itself; and, if it does in this case, the high prices will not continue.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not admit that the price abroad is abnormally high.

Mr. SMOOT. Everyone else admits it.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SMOOT. Every manufacturer admits it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Every country, and the world, too, has its ebb and flow of business. Business has been good abroad in the last year, but I deny that business has been bad in the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, all I know is that every manufacturer who appeared before the committee stated that business had been poor for last year, and, of course, I think they ought to know. I take it for granted that their books show such to be the fact. The volume of business and production show it and the prices show it.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are people who have lost money in the United States in business in the last year, and that would be true of every year.

Mr. SMOOT. I am speaking generally.

Mr. CUMMINS. But there are people who, if they do not double their fortunes every year, consider the country upon the eve of bankruptcy.

Mr. SIMMONS. According to the stories going the rounds of the newspapers, I do not think there is any stagnation in the iron and steel industry in this country; I do not think they are having any trouble about continuing the enormous, the fabulous profits they have been making in recent years under an arrangement by which they have been able during the whole of the past decade to practically keep the price of steel rails at a fixed sum—$28 a ton. There has been no relaxation of the hold of the United States Steel Trust and its subsidiaries, the independent manufacturers, and, so far as prices are concerned, they are nothing but subsidiaries. The United States Steel Co. fixes the price arbitrarily so as to satisfy the desire of the stockholders for profits, and the independent companies gracefully accept that price and help maintain it. If there has been any stagnation in recent times, Mr. President, I do not think it has affected the prices or materially affected the profits of the producers of steel and iron in this country.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understood the Senator to say that Herbert Knox Smith in his report showed that pig iron cost eleven dollars and some cents per ton.

Mr. SIMMONS. I gave the averages reported by him. They were: For Bessemer pig, cost $13.76—that is the highest price—basic pig, $12.80; southern, $10.02.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator in referring to pig iron have in mind foundry or steel-making iron? For which kind of iron is the price quoted?

Mr. SIMMONS. I only give the Senator the figures I have. I have no technical knowledge about the different methods of making pig iron, and I do not pretend to have.

Mr. SMOOT. There is a great deal of difference as to what figures you take.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am only giving the Senator the general facts in the report. I have no technical knowledge on this subject. The Senator is a very technical man; he is versed in the technique of all the manufacturing industries of the country, and I can not meet him on that basis, because I confess I am lacking in detailed information of that character.

Mr. SMOOT. There is a difference, and I do not know on what basis the Senator made the comparisons.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not discussing the process by which iron is made; all I know is that the report from which I have read designates the highest priced product as Bessemer, he designates the intermediate priced as basic, and he designates the lowest priced as the southern product.

Mr. CUMMINS. I remember the figures well enough to identify them, I think. The first price given is for Bessemer pig, the second price given is for basic steel——

Mr. SMOOT. Basic or foundry iron?

Mr. CUMMINS. And the third price is for southern pig. I fancy the Senator from Utah may reach somewhat different results in the paper that he has in his hand from those reached by the Senator from North Carolina, because I infer that the results given by the Senator from North Carolina are those obtained after deducting what are known as intercompany profits, while probably the results on the sheet the Senator from Utah has in his hand include the profits supposed to be derived by one company after another in going through different processes; that is, the profit of the ore company and the profit of the transportation company before the ore reaches the furnace.

Mr. SMOOT. That only applies to the Steel Corporation?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, I am speaking in a general way.

Mr. CUMMINS. It applies to a great many corporations, because most of them have these integrating profits.

Mr. SMOOT. I take the figures exactly as Herbert Knox Smith reports them. Commencing with the lease, the royalty paid upon the ore of 25 cents, the mining charge of 82 cents, and every step there is in the manufacture of pig iron from ore to the finished pig iron, the cost is shown to be $14.01 per ton. Mr. Schwab testified in 1909 that the cost was $14. He stated exactly the items he included in making up that $14, and the Steel Corporation in 1910 filed their statement, which showed the cost to be $14.02. So that we have Mr. Schwab, Herbert Knox Smith, and the Steel Corporation within 2 cents of one another, and each one in arriving at the cost stated exactly what was paid for the ore, for the mining, and for every process of manufacture.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not intend to interrupt the Senator from North Carolina any further, but if the Senator from Utah will examine the table in the report of the Commissioner of Corporations, from which the paper he has in his hands was taken, he will find that at the very head of the table it is stated that this does include intercompany profits. If he will turn over to the latter part of Mr. Smith's report he will find a place in which those profits are deducted from that amount, and that reaches the result stated by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is exactly what I am giving. I have not, Mr. President, the technical knowledge to make this calculation myself. In my statement I accept as true the calculations and findings made by the distinguished author of this Government report.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, let me ask the Senator this additional question: In making comparisons of the cost of pig iron in foreign countries, has he included the same items employed in estimating the cost in this country? Has he included in the foreign cost of production the cost of mining the ore, transportation charges, and so forth?

Mr. SIMMONS. I suppose that Mr. Pepper, who is an expert and who was acting for the Government and doing the specific thing under instructions to find out the labor cost, only included those things which were properly chargeable to labor cost, and I assume that Mr. Herbert Knox Smith, in making the same investigations with a view to ascertaining the labor cost, included all things which are properly items of labor cost.

I am not going to discuss with the Senator his ideas of what ought to be charged in estimating the labor cost of this product. They may conform to the ideas of Mr. Schwab before the committee. He seemed to think, according to his testimony before the committee, that in determining the labor cost of making iron and steel you ought to go back and inquire as to the cost, the profits, the losses, and so on, in every operation from the time you began to take the ore out of the mine until you converted it into the finished product. That may be the idea of the Senator from Utah about it.

Mr. SMOOT. Every man in business has to do that very thing if he expects to be successful; and if he does not do it he is bound to fail, just as sure as the sun will rise to-morrow morning.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not care to press that line of investigation further than to say that, from my viewpoint, in fixing labor cost in connection with the duty on pig iron the labor cost of converting the ore into pig is the only material question.

Mr. President, one of the most conspicuous figures in connection with the steel industry is Mr. Charles Schwab. I wish to give his testimony before the House committee investigating the United States Steel Corporation. In that investigation Mr. Schwab said:

Mr. DANFORTH. How are the costs of labor in steel and iron industries in the other countries that you mention as compared with ours?

Mr. SCHWAB. Do you mean the cost per ton—the cost of labor per ton of steel—or the average labor per man?

Mr. DANFORTH. The labor per man is what I had in mind.

Mr. SCHWAB. The cost of labor per man in the United States is about double what it is in Holland and Belgium, and I should say two and a quarter times as much as it is in Germany. I refer to the earnings of the American steel workers.

Mr. DANFORTH. How does that affect the price of our product in this country?

Mr. SCHWAB. I think the cost per ton in the United States is as cheap as it is abroad, notwithstanding the fact——

Mr. DANFORTH. Even with the added load of labor?

Mr. SCHWAB. Yes. I think the reason for that is because we manufacture in such large quantities. We manufacture under the economic conditions that I spoke of, and our tonnages are so great.

Mr. STERLING. Why is the tariff duty necessary, if you can produce a ton here as cheaply as they can there?

Mr. SCHWAB. For the same reason that the tariff duty is necessary over there. Why do they have a high tariff with this low labor?

Mr. STERLING. You would say, then, that the only purpose of our tariff was to set off the tariff of other countries?

Mr. SCHWAB. The tariff would, I think, protect our own labor, as a matter of fact, because in some of these countries they have very cheap raw material. China, for example, is now shipping pig iron into the United States.

Mr. President, there has been a great protest about China shipping pig iron into the United States, when the facts are that out of a total domestic production of about 27,000,000 tons of pig iron in this country there were imported in the last year to the whole Pacific coast only the insignificant and negligible quantity of about 40,000 tons.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from North Carolina has quoted from Mr. Schwab's testimony of some years ago. We had Mr. Schwab before the Finance Committee——

Mr. SIMMONS. I am going to refer to that before I get through. I shall state that Mr. Schwab has made before the Senate committee a statement very different from this.

Mr. SMOOT. And the Senator will state the reason Mr. Schwab gives, that to-day is entirely different from what the situation was a few years ago, because of the fact that——

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not reached that. I hope the Senator will not anticipate my argument.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not wish to anticipate the Senator, but I thought, inasmuch as he had quoted from Mr. Schwab regarding the cost years ago, it should be stated why he has changed that testimony.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall quote fully and frankly Mr. Schwab's statement before the Senate Finance Committee which would seem to be in conflict with his statement just quoted by me. I will state to the Senator, however, that the statement from Mr. Schwab's testimony which I have just read was not made a few years ago, as he says, but was made only nine months ago—that is, in August, 1911.

I am aware that Mr. Schwab in his recent testimony before the Finance Committee of the Senate claimed that he had been misunderstood in his former statements, and insisted that the cost of production here was greater than abroad. This difference he said was due to the difference in the cost of labor here and abroad.

Mr. Schwab's statement before the Finance Committee was based, as he admitted, upon the theory that labor was no more efficient here than abroad; upon the theory that the labor cost of an article is measured by the per diem wages paid labor, without any reference to whether one man can do more and does do more than another man. That is upon the per diem wages of the employees. His statement of August, 1911, was based upon the labor cost per ton, without reference to per diem, which would seem to be the true basis of estimating cost of production.

Per diem wages, Mr. President, are manifestly a false standard of measuring the cost of production.

It is manifest that of two men receiving the same rate of wage per diem the one may produce twice as much as the other and that the labor cost of one product will be twice as much as that of the other product.

We raise wheat and corn in my State. Much of our lands are probably as fertile as the wheat lands of the Middle West. Wages of farm labor in North Carolina are much below those of the Middle West, and yet I am confident that the labor cost of raising wheat and corn in the Middle West is far below that in my State. That the labor cost of neither the farm nor of the factory can be determined by the per diem wage of labor I think all of our experience, whether in agriculture or in manufacture, must demonstrate.

Not only Mr. Schwab, but practically all the representatives of the industry who came before the Senate committee, based their testimony as to difference in costs upon the alleged difference in the per diem wage scale here and abroad, assuming equal efficiency of labor.

Upon this question I desire to read some extracts from an illuminating statement made by Representative REDFIELD, a prominent manufacturer, delivered June 12, 1911:

> Labor cost per unit varies with time and place, and in the same shop is constantly changing. It is unlike in each of several mills producing the same goods, belonging to the same company. A superintendent who would take three mills making the same goods, under the same ownership, in three different cities, and get the cost alike would be a wonder.
> Since it is clear that the cost of production is a large and complex subject, of which the item of labor forms but one, and often a minor, part, and that cost is fluctuating and variable, it follows that no tax can be laid which will in different places and at different times always cover the difference in cost between foreign and domestic producers.

He was speaking from the standpoint of an experienced manufacturer who sells his products not only here but all over the world, and who has visited the factories of other countries and studied the questions connected with methods and cost of production as he states in his speech quoted from.

> There is no such fixed difference in cost between foreign and domestic producers. There is not, and there never can be, such a thing as fixity of cost.
> The difference—mark it well, gentlemen; I know from practical experience it is true—the difference between three domestic concerns in labor cost may be as great, or even greater, than the difference between foreign and domestic concerns in the same line. The attempt to adjust a tariff rate to cover such a difference is therefore absurd. If it provides for the difference in the cost of foreign goods and of American goods made in an American factory where those goods are expensively made, it would provide an enormous bonus for an American manufacturer who made his goods economically.
> A steadily decreasing labor cost per unit of product is not inconsistent with, but on the contrary is normal to, a coincident advance in the rate of pay for the work when accompanied by careful study of methods and equipment, as previously suggested. Conversely, low-priced labor nearly always is costly per unit produced, and usually is inconsistent with good tools, equipment, and large and fine product, else such labor would not be low priced.
> Nowhere is the rate of output equal to that in America. Nowhere else is the problem of saving labor cost so closely studied as it is here. Labor-saving machinery is an American specialty and product. Nowhere is the cost of transportation so low as in America. Nowhere is the discipline in a factory so close, so sharp, and so keen as in an American shop.
> From the above sketch it is affirmed, without fear of successful contradiction, that American production to-day is often as cheap or cheaper in the labor cost per unit than foreign, and, so far from needing protection, it needs to be set free, that we may conquer the world.

SCHWAB ON LABOR COST—DIFFERENCE IN PER DIEM, BUT NONE IN ACTUAL LABOR COST.

Again, Mr. President, I wish to refer to the testimony of Mr. Schwab before the committee. I am selecting him because he is probably the most representative manufacturer who came before the committee, and who notwithstanding his former statement that the cost of iron and steel production in this country was as cheap as abroad, he was most insistent in his contention that the rates fixed in this bill were insufficient to measure the alleged difference in wages here and elsewhere.

I want to read from the colloquy between Mr. Schwab and my colleague upon the committee, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. It shows the basis upon which Mr. Schwab makes his calculation, a basis which I think is utterly untenable:

> Senator GALLINGER. Can you give us approximately, and yet with reasonable correctness, the difference in the wage scale in your industry here and abroad?
> Mr. SCHWAB. Very gladly. In England the wages for the same positions, on an average, are just about one-half of what they are in Bethlehem.
> Senator GALLINGER. Do you mean including the ordinary labor, or——
> Mr. SCHWAB. Including all the workmen. The average earnings are about one-half. In Belgium it goes below that. I can not state it with the same accuracy, but probably it is in the proportion of 2½ to 1; and in Germany it is about the same.
> Senator WILLIAMS. Is that per diem, per hour, or how?
> Mr. SCHWAB. The average earnings of the men per year; for the whole time.
> Senator WILLIAMS. Could you not make a statement as to the average earnings per diem or per hour?
> Mr. SCHWAB. I can. I told you that our average earnings last year were $788.88 for every man and boy in our employ.
> Senator WILLIAMS. Can you give us an idea of what proportion labor bears to the total cost of making steel?
> Mr. SCHWAB. In the steel work itself, one-third of the total cost is labor; but, of course, another third is in supplies and railroad freights, all of which are affected by the wages in their industries.
> Senator WILLIAMS. I understand that. The labor constitutes about one-third of the total cost of the production of the article as it is ready to leave the mills?
> Mr. SCHWAB. In the works itself; yes.
> Senator WILLIAMS. You say the wage in England is about one-half what it is here?
> Mr. SCHWAB. About.
> Senator WILLIAMS. About one-half?
> Mr. SCHWAB. Yes, sir.
> Senator WILLIAMS. If the total cost of the labor is 33⅓ per cent, then the difference between the cost here and the cost there would be half of 33⅓ per cent?
> Mr. SCHWAB. In the mills.
> Senator WILLIAMS. Of course, these other people are all getting their nips at the taxation system as they come along, and they plead "labor," too. That would be one-half of 33⅓ per cent then, and that would be the percentage statement of the amount that would be requisite to put the cost of the labor in your mills upon an equality with the cost of the labor in Great Britain?
>
> Mr. SCHWAB. Yes, sir; that is correct, practically.
> Senator WILLIAMS. So, the total cost of the labor in the mills is about 33⅓ per cent by your statement; and Great Britain pays about half what we do, by your statement. That is what I wanted to get at.
> Mr. SCHWAB. That is quite true—in the mills. I want that to appear.
> Senator SMOOT. Or, in other words, if every other item of expense attached to the manufacture of steel was equal with every other country, then 16⅔ per cent would be necessary to protect you against the actual labor cost?
> Mr. SCHWAB. Exactly so.
> Senator WILLIAMS. And that proceeds upon the theory that your labor is no more efficient, that it turns out no more product per hour that it is employed than the foreign labor?
> Mr. SCHWAB. That assumes that, of course.

Mr. BACON. May I ask a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I did not exactly understand the purport of that testimony. Do I understand the Senator to read from a colloquy in which Mr. Schwab says that the actual cost is one-half what it is in this country or that is what the proportion is in this country?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Schwab says that, measured as he measures it, by the per diem cost, the labor cost there is one-half of what it is in this country.

Mr. BACON. I understand.

Mr. SIMMONS. He says that the labor cost of the article is 33⅓ per cent of the total cost and that the wages of labor here are twice as high as in Europe, making the difference in the wage cost of production here and abroad one-half of that amount, or about 16 per cent.

Mr. BACON. What I was asking the Senator is this: I may have misunderstood it. I suppose, of course, Mr. Schwab did not mean to say that the cost of labor in this country was one-third and of that country one-sixth. He does not mean that?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no. He says the labor cost is one-third the cost of production.

Mr. BACON. That is what I mean. I did not express myself clearly, perhaps. The labor cost is one-third of the cost of production. He does not mean in another country the cost varies——

Mr. SIMMONS. No; in Europe he says the labor cost is one-half of what it is here, and that there the labor cost is represented by one-half of 33⅓, or 16 per cent.

Mr. BACON. No; that would not be correct.

Mr. SIMMONS. In other words, he says this——

Mr. BACON. I want to get this point clear.

Mr. SIMMONS. He says that the labor cost in this country is 33⅓ per cent of the total cost of production, and in England it is one-half of that, or 16 per cent of the total cost.

Mr. BACON. That is the point I want to get at—whether he meant simply to say that the amount labor actually received was only one-half, or one-half in proportion to the total cost.

Mr. SMOOT. That would be absolutely correct if everything else that went into the cost of producing steel was equal. Then it would be true. But there are a great many other items. Therefore, the labor cost in foreign countries would be more than 16⅔ per cent, based upon the cost in this country.

This had reference to heavy articles where the labor is only a small part of it, but the testimony shows that on many articles made under this schedule the labor cost is 80 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know there are many who hold opinions of that sort; but I shall attempt to show, not by the testimony of interested witnesses, not by the testimony of people having already a sufficient rate of protection who want absolute prohibition of foreign importations of their products, but I shall show by Government statistics which never up to this time have been questioned—Government statistics that were used by the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means in their minority report on this very bill—that the actual labor cost of producing iron and steel in this country is only about 16 per cent of the total cost of the article, and not 33 per cent, as apparently contended by Mr. Schwab.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want to leave the matter just where the Senator from Utah has left it.

Mr. SIMMONS. My attention was momentarily diverted, and perhaps, if my answer is not responsive, I did not correctly understand the statement of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt the Senator from North Carolina will correct it later on. The suggestion of the Senator from Utah is that Mr. Schwab's statement of the labor cost of 33⅓ per cent was on the cheaper and cruder forms of steel. I do not remember any such statement by Mr. Schwab, but if there was any such statement, it is obviously wrong.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not understand Mr. Schwab as confining his statement as to average cost of production only to the heavier articles of the steel and iron industry.

Mr. CUMMINS. It may be, taking the steel schedule at large, that there is a labor proportion of 25 or 30 per cent, but taking the conversion of pig iron into steel rails, the labor cost of performing those operations is only about $1.80 a ton, and the increased value is more than $14 a ton. So Mr. Schwab could not have meant that in the cruder forms of manufacture that are carried on almost wholly by machinery the labor cost is 33 per cent of the cost of the article.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know what Mr. Schwab meant, but Mr. Schwab was undoubtedly speaking of the industry here and abroad as a whole, and I understood he was giving what he claimed was the average cost.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. And Mr. Schwab insisted that the total labor cost in producing steel and iron, on the average, was about 33⅓ per cent; that the labor cost of producing the same product in Europe was about one-half of that amount, or 16 per cent. I am going to attempt to show by authorities, which to my mind are conclusive, that the total labor cost here is not higher than 16 per cent, or one-half of the amount he stated.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understood the Senator from North Carolina, but I did not quite understand the Senator from Utah in trying to confine that proportion to the coarser or cruder forms of steel.

Mr. SMOOT. I did want to confine it there; and not only that, but I can show to the Senate it is absolutely true. I can say that there are many things under this schedule as to which the testimony shows beyond doubt that the labor cost is 80 per cent of the cost of the article.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt of that. But the mere fact that the Senator from Utah may say there are some articles in which the labor cost is 80 per cent proves conclusively that in the lower and coarser forms of steel the proportion is not 33 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Schwab was talking about the average. If he was not speaking about the average, he was misleading the committee. Of course, the labor cost of some articles would have to be lower and some higher than the average.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no doubt that the labor cost on some articles covered by this schedule is greater than 33 per cent, but I have no doubt the labor cost in many other items is below it. And what Mr. Schwab was speaking about was the average cost, and that is all I am talking about. You can not take the labor cost of one small item in this bill and from that argue what is the labor cost that should be considered in connection with the Republican theory of fixing the tariff so as to cover the difference between the labor cost here and abroad.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not want the Senate or the Senator to understand that I said that the labor cost on any of the articles would be 80 per cent; I never so stated; I simply said that where the labor cost would be 33⅓ per cent it was not on the highly finished articles under this schedule. There are 25,000 establishments in this country making goods embraced in this schedule. I see the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] at this particular time——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think the Senate will bear me out that I have been exceedingly patient the whole time in yielding to interruptions. I am perfectly willing to yield for a question; I am perfectly willing to yield for a reasonable statement in reply to anything I may say in answer to a question; but it is too much to ask that I should yield for a speech whenever the Senator from Utah feels like he wants to make a speech. I yield to the Senator for anything except a speech.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. My attention was attracted by a statement made by the Senator from North Carolina that Mr. Schwab must have meant the average. Mr. Schwab was talking about his particular industry.

Mr. SIMMONS. Not in all that he said. He did speak of his particular factory and of the average annual wages paid at this time, but after that, when he was replying to the general questions of the Senator from Mississippi as to wages and cost of production, which followed that statement, he was referring, I think, manifestly to the industry at large.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think that Mr. Schwab——

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator if it be true that Mr. Schwab, as he contends, was speaking especially with reference to his own industry, if he does not produce in his two plants practically all of the heavier articles and some of the finer ones that are covered by the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. I was going to ask the Senator if he thinks Mr. Schwab had any knowledge concerning the manufacture of files, shotguns, table and kitchen ware, fishhooks, rivets, cutlery, needles, and all those things which are component parts of this bill. Could Mr. Schwab possibly have meant to include these smaller manufactures, which employ tens of thousands and indeed hundreds of thousands of men in this country? Was he not talking about the manufacture of steel and the larger articles with which he was familiar?

Mr. SIMMONS. I should say that Mr. Schwab is probably the best informed man with reference to the steel and iron industry in all of its departments that we have in this country, and I think the colloquy I quoted a little while ago indicates that Mr. Schwab was speaking in general terms, and not specifically.

Mr. GALLINGER. Regarding the innumerable industries scattered over the country producing these million articles? It seems incredible to me that it could be so.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not mean to say that he has detailed knowledge of the cost of making every article, but I do mean to say that a man of Mr. Schwab's great prominence in this industry, who started from the beginning and worked through the factories in all the stages of production, is probably posted as to the rate of wages that prevail in most of the iron and steel industries of the country, and whether he has or not, Mr. President, I maintain that the very testimony itself shows that he was speaking with reference to wages generally here as compared with wages generally abroad.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator evidently can not finish to-night. It is now half past 5 o'clock, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SIMMONS. Before that motion is put——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is concerned about that. He has given notice that he will speak to-morrow. I would be very glad to finish to-morrow, because I have not been well the last few days and I am a little weary just now, but if it should interfere with the Senator from Iowa to-morrow, I would not feel like trespassing upon his time.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may say that while I gave notice that I would address the Senate to-morrow upon my amendment, I know that it would be for the convenience of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to follow the Senator from North Carolina, and I would just as soon, a little rather, indeed, speak a day later than to-morrow. So I will follow the Senator from Missouri, whenever that may be.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa spoke to me on the floor aside to the same effect he has just stated. I want to go away in a day or two and therefore it would be a convenience to me if I could address the Senate to-morrow instead of a later date. We meet at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what the Senator from Iowa suggested, that the Senator from Missouri should follow me and he would speak later.

Mr. STONE. I say I accept the courtesy of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad to do it. It is quite probable that I will consume some time in submitting the subject to the Senate, and I would be very glad to yield to the Senator from Missouri in order to accommodate him.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY ON OCEAN STEAMERS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator from Utah will withhold his motion for a moment, I should like to get unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate bill 3815, which has been favorably reported by the Committee on Commerce, requiring certain vessels to carry two wireless-telegraph operators instead of one.

Mr. SMOOT. I will withhold the motion for that purpose.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3815) to amend an act entitled "An act to require apparatus and operators for radiocommunication on certain ocean steamers," approved June 24, 1910.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if that is a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the act entitled "An act to require apparatus and operators for radiocommunication on certain ocean steamers," approved June 24, 1910, be amended by the addition of the following words to section 1: "Provided also, That on and after the 1st day of July, 1912, it shall be unlawful for any ocean-going steamer of the United States or of any foreign country, carrying 100 or more persons, whether passengers or crew, or both, to leave or attempt to leave any port of the United States unless such steamer shall be equipped with an efficient apparatus for radiocommunication in good working order, in charge of two or more persons skilled in the use of such apparatus, one of whom shall be on duty at all hours of the day and night, which apparatus shall be capable of transmitting and receiving messages over a distance of at least 100 miles, night or day."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if where the bill says "one of whom shall be on duty at all hours" it would not be better to say "one or the other of whom"? I do not know that it is material.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the phraseology has been pretty carefully gone over by the committee. It changed the phraseology I used, and I am willing to accept the language as reported. I think it is reasonably accurate and will produce the result aimed at.

Mr. GORE. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 1, 1912, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 30, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker, who took the chair amid general applause.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee for the ideals enunciated by the Master, for the spirit of altruism exemplified in His holy life. Help us to understand and assimilate His precepts, to emulate His virtues, that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in our hearts; to the glory and honor of Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PRIMARIES IN COLORADO.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Having in mind that houn'-dog performance in Colorado yesterday—and I submit that it was some speed, considering the broken character of the landscape out there—I wish to inquire whether the Speaker takes official cognizance of the prevalence of dog days at this early season of the year?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. [Laughter.]

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21279) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, with Mr. HAY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to state that on yesterday afternoon the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] was on the floor, and at the expiration of his time asked unanimous consent to continue. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] then moved to close debate, and the Chair recognized the gentleman from Tennessee when he should have put the question for unanimous consent asked by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. The Chair desires to correct that mistake. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by inserting, after the words "for highways of class C," the following: "Provided, That for roads used for the purpose of transporting rural mails meeting all the conditions and requirements of class C, except that they have a road track not less than 16 feet wide, compensation shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile, and said roads shall be known and designated as class D."

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I merely desire briefly to state the cause for moving this amendment.

You observe that the road track in the three classes provided for in the proposed impending bill is to be 9 feet wide—class A, road track 9 feet wide; class B, road track 9 feet wide; class C, road track 9 feet wide. The amendment submitted creates class D and provides that any road possessing all the requirements of class B but having a road track not less than 16 feet wide shall be compensated for at the rate of $25 per annum per mile. The object of this bill, as stated, is to compensate State civil jurisdictions for use on the part of the Government of the highways for the transportation of rural mail. The next purpose and object of the bill is to encourage the construction and maintenance of good highways. Improvement of country roads brings the farmer closer to his market, church, and school. Good roads will save the farmer millions of dollars in the wear and tear of his wagons and other vehicles. We pay the railroads over $50,000,000 for their use in transporting mail. Why not pay the States and counties at least a reasonable compensation for use of country roads for improving life in the country? It will result in extending the rural mail service. It will be a godsend to the rural carriers who have to travel poor roads and ford dangerous streams. Build good roads and we will help keep the boys on the farm and do but partial justice to the people who produce the food and raiment for the world. Encourage the improvement and happiness of country life by passing this bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the gentleman's amendment provides in substance that a gravel road 16 feet wide shall receive the same compensation as a macadam road 9 feet wide?

Mr. RODDENBERY. It does.

Mr. MANN. That is the substance?

Mr. RODDENBERY. It is; and if this were anything more than an experiment and an initiation of a system, perhaps the observation of the gentleman might have a material bearing. It may have in the minds of gentlemen, notwithstanding, but as the bill now is, if it is complied with, a 9-foot roadway does not give a first-class road of any kind, macadam or otherwise, because it is too narrow; yet it is the beginning of an aid to public roads, and I do not think it is subject to serious criticism.

When we inaugurate the system, why not make one provision in the bill offering inducement to construction of wide roadbeds, so that in the construction of all classes of roads the State authorities may understand that wide road tracks will be looked upon with favor, so that in the construction of class B or in the construction of class C or class A the authorities will have in mind the advantage of beginning construction of a 16-foot roadbed? This amendment, in my judgment, will greatly stimulate the construction of wider and better roads.

I am in accord with this bill just as it is now, and it will receive the approval of the country, a few city districts to the contrary notwithstanding. But when we initiate it, why not put in a wise provision that recognizes what we must ultimately recognize—that the 9-foot road track does not establish and adopt a good road such as the country views and will regard as a first-class road?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not know that in the mountainous portion of the United States, where the roads follow the streams and follow along down through the canyons, very often our roads are built the same as half tunnels—they are built into a shelf—and they are the best roads possible in the world, and yet they are only 9 feet wide? There is no necessity of their being over 9 feet wide. We have what are called "turn-outs." I ask the gentleman if he does not desire to recognize the western half of the United States?

Mr. RODDENBERY. The gentleman is speaking now from the standpoint of his State and of certain territory, and the gentleman from that point of view is evidently correct. But the pending bill is fixing a general good-roads policy for all the States.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why not limit it?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I am not limiting it, because necessarily this is a broad national scheme of road betterment, and there is no way to make it provide equally and alike for each particular State or locality.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RODDENBERY. May I have two or three minutes' extension of time, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, my amendment does not in any way interfere with the present classification. But it does recognize that in that territory where 16-foot road tracks are permissible and practicable it is desirable to construct that kind of roads. The road authorities will therefore widen the roads so that vehicles can pass and repass in greater safety.

I trust that the simple provision of this amendment will receive the favorable consideration of the House. Whatever the House may do with this amendment, I shall heartily support the composite bill which the gentlemen have presented. I should be glad if the joint authors of the pending bill could accept this amendment, adding class D, so that when we inaugurate this system we may offer inducement for the best of country roads. If we are ultimately to have good roads we are bound finally to adopt such a provision, and I trust the House will do so now. [Applause.]

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire briefly to oppose this amendment.

I realize that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] is in sympathy with this movement, but I fear his enthusiasm has carried him so far that if this amendment should be adopted the entire bill would be in danger. The tendency of modern road building is toward narrow, well-drained roadbeds, and it would be a step backward to encourage the construction of wide roads to be cut into ruts by careless drivers.

Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] hit the nail on the head yesterday when he said that this whole question is one of taxation. We all know that when the Constitution was adopted the States gave up to the Federal Government nearly all of their powers of indirect taxation. I think, as I have said before on the floor of this House, that a great deal of buncombe and nonsense is indulged in in the criticism of indirect taxation. You may go into the legislature of every State of the Union and find there the members declaiming against the burdens and inequalities of the direct property tax. These taxes are not paid by the rich but by the small property owner, who does not have the opportunities of the rich man to escape his just share of taxation. The States are now overburdened with direct property taxes. Something should be done to help them. Complaint is made that indirect taxes are paid when people do not know it. The farmers would be glad to pay the taxes on their farms without knowing it. I do not agree with the gentleman from Texas that the Democrats in the House are barred from supporting this measure, but I do mean that the Federal taxes are so much more easily paid that there is a demand all over this country that the Federal Government pay some of the expenses of what has come to be a great Federal service. The Democratic Party, as was said yesterday, has grown to be known as a party in favor of a tariff for revenue only, and I may say that under the definition of the distinguished leader from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] of a tariff for revenue.

It has come to mean a tariff which equals the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, and therefore embraces all of that degree of protection which is demanded by the Republican platform, all that was ever demanded by Alexander Hamilton, Henry Clay, Abraham Lincoln, not to say William McKinley; so there is no reason why we should not all be in favor of this measure. The taxing powers of the Federal Government are broad. They have not been nearly exhausted. The amount demanded for this purpose is small. It can not reach $8,000,000 and will probably never exceed $15,000,000. It is a broad, constructive measure, which will improve the highways of the entire Nation.

I shall not favor it because it favors any particular class of our people, as has been suggested here, but for the reason that it means the encouragement of industry, the closer intercourse of the farm with the cities, and the general development of all our resources and the happiness of all our people. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] states that the city of New York pays 70 per cent of the taxes of the State of New York. Why does it do that, gentlemen? Not alone because New York has been built up by the wonderful industry of the agricultural people of New York, but because in New York are held the bonds and the stocks of the wonderful transportation systems of the country. And how were they built? They were built because the people of the West taxed themselves to vote subsidies to the railroads at from $6,000 to $40,000 a mile, and now you have all that wealth in New York City that pays the tax. Gentlemen are economical now, but will they be so careful when it comes to appropriating money for harbor defenses and improvement and the building of battleships? It is notorious that the eastern coast of the country have for years had their people fed by Federal appropriations.

It has been mentioned here that the Chicago post office pays $8,000,000 more each year than the expense of administering the post office there.

Mr. MADDEN. More than $14,000,000 more.

Mr. JACKSON. All right. Take it that way. Now, why does it pay it? If I understand the proposition correctly, the revenues of a post office are computed where the stamps are bought and canceled. To whom are the people of Chicago writing? Are they spending this $14,000,000 surplus in exchanging billets doux across the Chicago River?

Mr. MANN. Very largely.

Mr. JACKSON. Oh, no. They are spending that money in paying postage to maintain and build up the splendid commerce of the West, of which Chicago happens to be the queen city. How long would that $14,000,000 surplus last if you wiped out the Chicago stockyards, which are maintained from the great farms and ranches of the West? Who pays the postage for Sears, Roebuck & Co., Montgomery Ward & Co., and the Marshall Field Co.? The people out on the farms and in the country towns who use their products. So, gentlemen, I am going to support this measure, not because it favors one class but because if this wonderful prosperity of the farm and country should perish or fail in its proper development, the constituency of the gentlemen from Chicago and from New York would grow hungry.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, the gentleman ought to be fair. He does not know what fairness is when he votes for a proposition that only represents one-half of the people.

Mr. JACKSON. It is cheaper to support them while they yet labor a little bit than it would be to support them when they devote all of their attention to stock manipulation, and when being otherwise idle they shall occupy all of the time in devising ways to get their arms into the pork barrel of the National Treasury revenues. [Applause.]

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, this is an important measure, and as I have occupied very little of the time of this House I ask the courtesy of proceeding for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I do not know how general the gentleman in charge of this bill proposes to allow the debate to become. The House had 20 hours' discussion on this proposition, and while I have no intention of objecting to the gentleman, who is a member of the Committee on Agriculture, having an extension of time, I am going to object to anybody else having additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I rejoice to-day that after the lapse of over three-quarters of a century the Congress of the United States is once more seriously considering the question of Government aid in the construction and maintenance of public roads; that to-day we have before this body in concrete form a proposition which will receive its approval, and which, if enacted into law, will give aid to and encourage the construction of good roads in every part of the Republic.

In the early days of this country our fathers were compelled to use the waterways and the highways, such as they had; there were no railroads or other means of transportation. An examination of the messages of the Presidents, the records of Congress, and other public documents shows that in those days much thought and attention was given to the subject of public roads; that all the Presidents of the early period favored Government aid, and that during this time Congress appropriated millions of dollars for the construction of roads, as well as for the improvement of rivers and harbors. With the invention of the steam engine and the construction of railroads Congress gradually ceased its appropriations for highways and turned its attention to aiding the building of this more modern means of transportation. Millions of acres of public lands were given to great corporations to induce them to build railroads. It has been variously estimated that the value of the land thus granted was from two to five billion dollars. It is not my purpose here to discuss the question as to whether that policy was wise or unwise; suffice it to say it was done, and to-day the great iron monster, drawing his burden of human freight and the products of human industry, is traversing every part of the land.

The building of railroads has been of inestimable value to the country. It has brought the producer and the consumer nearer together; it has cheapened transportation; it has brought the people into quick and easy communication; and has, with the aid of other facilities that have come with it, made our country one great commonwealth. To complete the work already begun but one thing is needed, so far as transportation is concerned, and that is a complete system of good roads, connecting the people of the rural communities and giving them quick and easy means of access to their local market places.

Mr. Chairman, it seems unnecessary to discuss the value of good roads in this presence. In France, England, and Germany, where they have complete systems of Government-constructed roads, it costs from 7 cents to 11 cents per ton per mile to transport products to market, while in this country, with our roads, it costs 23 cents per ton per mile.

The Secretary of Agriculture has estimated that the cost of hauling the products from the farm annually is six hundred millions. If our roads were as well improved as those of England, France, or Germany, there would be saved every year to the American farmer from three hundred to four hundred millions of dollars. A very large percentage of the farm products of this country must be hauled over wagon roads, and it is a known fact that it costs more to get products to the railroad than it costs to transport them by the railroads to the point of consumption. It costs more to haul a ton over 9 miles of wagon road than it costs to transport it from New York to Liverpool, a distance of over 3,000 miles. The farmer feeds the world, and whatever will enable him to get his products to market cheaply and quickly will not only help him, but will add to the welfare and happiness of the entire people.

Aside from the financial and material side of this question there are other reasons equally as important to be considered. Good roads tend to develop the moral, the educational, and the social conditions of country life. Give us good roads and we will have more and better churches, better schools, and increased and more regular attendance by the boys and girls. Give us better roads and intellectual and social intercourse among the people will be increased. All of these things will add to our national happiness and prosperity.

Those who oppose this measure argue that it will call for increased taxes, and hence a heavy burden on the people. They are entirely mistaken. It is a question of disbursing the money collected annually and placing it where it will be of the greatest benefit to the people. Already we have spent six hundred millions for rivers and harbors, two hundred millions for public buildings, nearly four hundred millions for the Panama Canal, to say nothing of vast sums spent in maintaining the Army and Navy. We are building roads on our island possessions, in Alaska, and in our national parks and through the national forests. We have spent two millions in Porto Rico, three millions in the Philippines, one and one-half millions in the Canal Zone, two millions in Alaska, and many millions in national forests and national parks.

Let us aid and encourage the States, counties, and communities in the building of roads that will be a benefit to the American farmer. He is the mainstay of the Government; he has paid a very large per cent of the taxes. Let us give him back some of it for those things which will be of immediate benefit to him and, in the end, redound to the good of the entire country.

There is no trouble about the money. All we will have to do will be to curtail just a little our enormous appropriations for the Army and Navy, our rivers and harbors, our public buildings, and other things too numerous to mention.

Much has been said about the cost of this measure, and some of its opponents have declared that it would cost the Government fifty or sixty millions annually. Let us see: The number of miles now traveled by the rural and star route carriers is 1,179,0000. The estimated number of miles in their respective classes is as follows: Class A, 35,000; class B, 83,000; and class C, 1,061,000. According to the prescribed rates of payments, the amount annually that this bill will carry, should every mile of road be sufficiently improved to fall into the respective classes, would be $18,450,000. It must be remembered, however, that a large proportion of the mileage of dirt roads will require much work at the hands of the local authorities before it will come up to the standard required in class C, hence the first required appropriation will probably be much less than this sum. Within a few years it is hoped that all the roads will be so improved as to be entitled to the compensation allowed in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I want very briefly to reply to the criticism made against this measure a few days ago by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], when he stated that it was a compromise scheme, hurriedly put together and reported over night by a committee, and had not been given deliberate and careful consideration.

This measure, known as the Shackleford bill, has had possibly as much consideration as any measure before this body. It is the consensus of the opinions of something like 35 or 40 Members of this body who, having introduced bills upon this subject, got together and agreed unanimously upon the pending proposition. It was then introduced into the House and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The authors presented to the committee the following petition:

To the Committee on Agriculture:

The undersigned Members, who have introduced bills on the subject of good roads, desiring to secure, as far as possible, harmony and unity of action among the friends of such legislation, have conferred with a view to agreeing upon a bill. After careful consideration we have prepared and agreed upon the subjoined bill and requested Mr. SHACKLEFORD to introduce it on behalf of us all. We have further requested Mr. SHACKLEFORD to appear before you and respectfully bespeak for the bill early and favorable consideration.

Very respectfully,

Ezekiel S. Candler, Mississippi; J. Thomas Heflin, Alabama; Thos. L. Rubey, Missouri; John J. Whitacre, Ohio; Joseph A. Taggart, Kansas; Joseph Howell, Utah; James F. Byrns, South Carolina; Kenneth D. McKellar, Tennessee; E. W. Saunders, Virginia; William B. Francis, Ohio; Richard W. Austin, Tennessee; Scott Ferris, Oklahoma; D. R. Anthony, jr., Kansas; George White, Ohio; Walter L. Hensley, Missouri; James M. Cox, Ohio; George A. Neeley, Kansas; J. J. Russell, Missouri; J. H. Goeke, Ohio; H. D. Flood, Virginia; Burton L. French, Idaho; T. T. Ansberry, Ohio; C. C. Anderson, Ohio; P. P. Campbell, Kansas; S. F. Prouty, Iowa; W. C. Adamson, George; Bird S. McGuire, Oklahoma; D. W. Shackleford, Missouri.

The Committee on Agriculture referred the bill to a subcommittee composed of Mr. LEVER of South Carolina, Mr. BEALL of Texas, Mr. SIMMONS of New York, Mr. HANNA of North Dakota, and myself. I had the distinguished honor of being chairman of this committee. We went to work at once.

Extensive hearings were held upon the proposition. The subcommittee practically rewrote the bill, adopting many amendments to it. When they had completed their work they requested the author of the original bill, Mr. SHACKLEFORD, to reintroduce the measure, in order that they might present it in the amended form to the full Committee on Agriculture. I am opposed to the amendment offered here this morning by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY], and in that connection I desire to say that the classification found in this bill was submitted to some of the very best road engineers in this country and has been approved by them as a correct classification and one so carefully worded that its requirements can not be misunderstood. This classification is the result of painstaking investigation. The wording has been carefully made, and I should dislike to have the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia adopted and undo everything that has been done by the committee in the classification of these roads.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUBEY. Certainly.

Mr. RODDENBERY. The gentleman does not understand that the amendment I offer affects classes A, B, or C, as to the width of them?

Mr. RUBEY. I understand it does not.

Mr. RODDENBERY. The gentleman understands it simply adds a new class—class D.

Mr. RUBEY. I do; but at the same time it adds a new class, D, and provides that it shall be 16 feet wide; this applies, as I understand it, to roads built of macadam, and it applies also to gravel roads and to dirt roads.

Mr. RODDENBERY. It applies to class B only.

Mr. RUBEY. Only to class B? Yet it gives to that class the same amount of compensation that it gives to class A, $25 a mile, which should only be given to the very highest class and best constructed roads.

Mr. Chairman, I desire, in the brief time allotted to me, to discuss just a few other things in connection with this measure. Much has been said upon the floor of this House as to where the money goes that is paid these various roads. Some criticism has been offered by gentlemen upon one side and upon the other saying that there is no provision in the bill that this money shall go toward the building of roads. Let me give you an illustration, and I think this illustration will shed light upon the entire matter. I will refer to my own district, and, in passing, I desire to say that as the roads are now constructed there is possibly not an entire rural route or star route in my district that would come under the provisions of this bill until the people go to work and improve it. Let us take rural route No. 1 going out of my town. We will say that it is 24 miles in length; the citizens will go to work and improve that road until it is entitled to come under class C, and then they will be entitled to $360 annually from the National Government. The Post Office Department will issue its warrant upon the United States Treasurer for $360. That warrant will be mailed to the county treasurer of my county. The county treasurer will place it to the credit of the fund of rural route No. 1, out of Lebanon, Mo. It will then be under the care and custody of the county court, and will be paid out by the county court and used for constructing, repairing, and improving the road upon that route, whether that work has been done or whether it is to be done in the future. Every man who lives upon that rural route will be a guardian of that fund, and he will see to it that every dollar of the $360 is paid out for work actually done upon that route. There is no question whatever but that every cent of that $360 will go to the maintenance and improvement of the route for the use of which the Government's warrant has been issued.

The opponents of this measure say that there is no demand for it, that the people of this country have not asked the Federal Government to pay rent. I want to say in this connection that the people of this country for years and years have been advocating that the Government of the United States should begin to take part in the road building of the country. I remember well a number of years ago there assembled in St. Louis the National Good Roads Convention. Men came there from all parts of the country, and in that convention they indorsed the proposition of Government aid to public roads. In every convention since that time down to the present the same thing has been done. Go with me wherever you will, into any convention in any State or county or district where men are assembled for the purpose of discussing the road proposition, and you will find them advocating Government aid in the construction and maintenance of the public highway. Let me say further, that had this pending bill been introduced into this House a few months earlier, had it been sent out to the people in all parts of the country, and had they thus obtained knowledge of the provisions of the bill, there is no doubt in my mind but that the Members of this House would now be receiving letters and petitions in great numbers asking them to support it. Those who are opposing this measure use many arguments, and yet when we simmer them down we find that they who oppose it are doing so because they do not believe in Government aid to roads in any form whatever. I am glad that no political lines are drawn in the consideration of this great proposition. Some upon the other side of the aisle have opposed it and a few upon this side, but the great majority of the Members of this body on both sides of the House are in favor of this proposition. I see my good friend from Texas, Mr. BEALL, is opposed to this proposition. I hold him in great esteem, as much so as any Member of this body.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUBEY. I just want to complete that statement. My friend from Texas [Mr. BEALL] has introduced into this House a bill for the purpose of establishing a bureau of markets in the Department of Agriculture. It is a good bill, and I am for it. Let me say to him this: That the question of markets depends more upon the condition of roads in this country than upon any other one proposition. [Applause.] Let me say to him that if he will help us and the people of this country to build roads, so that every farmer will have a good road going from his home to the market place, it will do more toward settling the question of markets than the establishment of a bureau of markets in the Department of Agriculture, with a branch bureau in every State in the American Union. [Applause.]

The people of my district are already awake to the importance of improved roads. During the last year active road work has been going on in every county, thousands of dollars have been raised by private subscription and used upon the roads. Only a few days ago the people of the road district where I reside submitted a proposition to bond the road district for $50,000 to build rock roads, and when the vote was taken it carried by a large majority, only 80 votes being cast against it.

When this bill passes—as I believe it will—you will see throughout the length and breadth of this land an era of road building such as you have never seen in all your lives; and before the 1st of June, 1914, you will find more roads have been built than ever before in the history of the country. Instead of paralyzing road building, as one of the gentlemen from Texas has said, it will have the contrary effect. It will enthuse the people, and they will go to work as never before and give freely of their money, their time, and their labor, well knowing that before they can receive a dollar of compensation from this bill their roads must meet the requirements of the law. Under the provisions of this measure it can be truly said the Government will help those who help themselves. [Applause.]

THE ROAD BILL AS PASSED BY THE HOUSE IN THE POST OFFICE BILL.

That for the purposes of this act certain highways of the several States, and the civil subdivisions thereof, are classified as follows:

Class A shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practically necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide composed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam, graded, crowned, compacted, and maintained in such manner that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface, and all other roads having a road track not less than 9 feet wide of a construction equally smooth, firm, durable, and expensive, and continuously kept in proper repair. Class B shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface. Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times. That whenever the United States shall use any highway of any State, or civil subdivision thereof, which falls within classes A, B, or C, for the purpose of transporting rural or star route mail, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile for highways of class A, $20 per annum per mile for highways of class B, and $15 per annum per mile for highways of class C. The United States shall not pay any compensation or toll for such use of such highways other than that provided for in this section, and shall pay no compensation whatever for the use of any highway not falling within classes A, B, or C: Provided, That in calculating or otherwise ascertaining the distance that mail is transported over any highway, such distance shall be measured or calculated in only one direction, and only one use of or travel over any such highway, or any part thereof, on any one trip by a carrier using the same, shall be considered. That any question arising as to the proper classification of any road used for transporting rural or star route mail shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. That the compensation herein provided for shall be paid at the end of each fiscal year by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Postmaster General to the officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act under and in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed jointly by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General: Provided, however, That no payment shall be made under the provisions of this paragraph for the use of any privately owned, or toll road.

The provisions of this paragraph shall go into effect on the 1st day of July, 1913.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending amendment close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that all debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri——

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not press that.

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). And all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. MANN. I understand. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. How much more time does the gentleman want?

Mr. MANN. Personally I do not want any more time. Can not we have some understanding in the committee, without cutting off debate at this time on amendments that are offered, that we will proceed in session this afternoon and this evening and endeavor to complete this bill in the Committee of the Whole to-day without limiting debate at this time too closely?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman from Illinois must be aware of the fact that we have had 20 hours of general debate, most if it on this proposition, and we have had debate since yesterday afternoon. I have no desire to cut off anybody who has an amendment or anybody who wants to be heard, but I do think the time ought to be fixed now when this debate should end.

Mr. MANN. Let me make this suggestion to the gentleman now, and that is, as long as amendments are offered which appear to be bona fide allow the gentleman offering the amendment to have five minutes to explain it, without making an order, and then, if the gentleman from Tennessee desires to be recognized in opposition, we will have a right to dispose of the amendment without undue debate on the amendment.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am not willing to have that for an unlimited length of time.

Mr. MANN. I do not ask that.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not object to proceeding for 30 or 40 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Let us try it that way; the gentleman can close debate at any time.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question? The gentleman from Tennessee will recall that some gentlemen on the floor, members of the committee which reported this bill from the Committee on Agriculture, desired to submit some remarks during the consideration of it in general debate, and that the gentleman from Tennessee assured some of those gentlemen he would not unduly limit debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman think he has?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I reassure the gentleman I will not do that. Gentlemen will have opportunity to be heard, for I am going to withdraw that motion and let debate proceed, and give notice that at the end of 10 or 15 minutes on each amendment I will ask for a vote.

Mr. MANN. At the end of five minutes let the gentleman ask for a vote.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, at the end of line 13, Shackleford bill, by inserting the following words: "Provided, That in calculating or otherwise ascertaining the distance that mail is transported over any highway such distance shall be measured or calculated in only one direction, and only one use of or travel over any such highway or any part thereof on any one trip by a carrier using the same shall be considered."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment so as to prevent duplicating or doubling in making calculations of travel on a rural route. The author of the bill says that, in his opinion, the bill now contains that provision. It may, but in uncertain language, and I wish to make it sure. It is not unusual for a rural route to be so laid out that a carrier travels over a part of it both going and coming, and it ought not to be permitted, ought not be possible, for any official, in calculating the distance the mail is transported or the distance for which money shall be paid, to take into consideration the distance traveled in both directions by a carrier. It seems to me the disposition of this House is to permit a city to receive compensation for the transportation of mail by a rural carrier from the city post office over the city streets. I do not believe in that; I am opposed to it. I offered an amendment yesterday calculated to correct that fault, as I deemed it to be a fault, but I was outvoted. Now, consider the situation. Each carrier in every instance starts from the city post office and travels over perhaps miles of city pavements to the city limits before he begins his rural route. Under the interpretation given by some who have expressed themselves on this bill it would be necessary for the Government to pay that municipality for the use of the streets by each carrier on each trip going in each direction. It seems to me it is all wrong, and this bill ought to be made clear and certain, so that there will be no room for doubt as to its interpretation or as to the duty of the officers in estimating distances and in paying the money.

A peculiar condition has developed concerning this portion of the bill. There seems to be a wide difference of opinion among Members who express themselves in speeches and in conversation as to the meaning and intent of the feature of the bill that I seek to amend. The author of the bill [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] says the bill as he presents it to the House contains the provision I think it ought to contain and is to be interpreted just as it will be if my amendment is adopted. Another gentleman says the bill means just the opposite from what I think it means. He favors the bill as it is, because it will, in his opinion, permit and require the Government to pay for use of or travel over a highway or a portion of it both going out and coming back. It is just such a situation as this that makes my amendment absolutely necessary, because there is evidently an honest difference of opinion, and abundant opportunity for difference of opinion, as to the proper interpretation of the language of the bill as it now stands. Congress is often accused of putting a "joker" into a bill, but the fault, if any there be, usually lies in the fact that language is open to different constructions and Members on each side of a question think they are right and that Members holding the opposite opinion as to the meaning of language are altogether wrong. The fault lies in the fact that men who use language do not always make their meaning clear and are unwilling to accept suggestions in order that proper words may be used to remove all possible doubt.

The author of the bill says that as it is now drawn it will not permit a municipality to receive double pay from the Government for the use of any portion of a public highway if the route of a carrier takes him over such portion of the road twice in one day in making one trip or one delivery of mail. He opposes the amendment because he says his bill means just what I think it ought to be made to mean. Another gentleman, as I say, opposes my amendment because he thinks the bill as it is now drawn may properly be construed just as I fear it will be construed if my amendment is not adopted. He wishes the bill to contain, and he thinks it does contain, language that will permit and require the Government to make double payment for the use of the highway or a portion of it if a carrier travels the highway twice in one day making one trip and one delivery of his mail. This difference of views expressed by these gentlemen certainly make it clear that an amendment of some kind is necessary. My amendment contains language that can not be misunderstood; it clearly forbids and prevents double payment, as I term it. If my opinion as to what the bill ought to be is approved by the House, then my amendment ought to be adopted. If the House holds the contrary view, if it believes that the Government ought to be permitted and required to make double payment for the use of a highway or a portion of it, then the bill ought to be amended so as clearly to contain this provision and make it clear that the Treasury of the United States should furnish this double payment. Of course, I think my amendment is right and ought to be adopted, but I particularly desire not to fall between the two stools. The House ought to know what the bill means and what the amendment means. It ought to vote intelligently and express itself clearly and express in unquestionable language its will as to the provisions of the law as it will be enacted.

I have not heretofore expressed myself in the House on the merits of the pending amendment to the Post Office bill, which, if adopted, will require the Federal Government to contribute money in aid of common country highways. I wish briefly to place myself clearly in favor of the measure. Some Members of the House, particularly gentlemen from large cities, oppose the bill because it is, in their opinion, either contrary to the Constitution or contrary to the policy they think the Government ought to pursue in the expenditure of public money. In my judgment the measure does not violate the letter or the spirit of the Constitution, which instrument expressly confers power upon Congress to establish post offices and post roads. A highway over which the Government, by its agents, carries mail is a post road, and as such may properly be established, and having been established may properly be maintained by the Government. The right of the Federal Government to expend money in so many different directions and for so many different purposes is upheld or defended under the "general-welfare clause" of the Constitution that I hesitate to invoke this clause in support of an appropriation for the use of highways over which mail is carried, but I think this clause, if it were necessary to resort to it, gives ample authority to Congress to make such appropriation.

One of the first messages, if not the first message, sent to Congress by President Washington called the attention of that body to the advisability and duty of building national roads; and later in his administration he referred again to the matter and urged establishing of post offices and the building of post roads as "instrumentalities in diffusing knowledge of the laws and proceedings of Government which contributes to the security of the people, serves to guard against effects of misrepresentation and misconception." Other Presidents, as well as other eminent statesmen, some of whom took part in the work of framing the Constitution, have expressed themselves in language which can not be misunderstood. Each of them, recognizing the urgent need and inestimable value of well-improved highways, urged Government aid in their construction and maintenance, under the authority contained in the Constitution. One of the most distinguished statesmen of our country, John C. Calhoun, conspicuous for the force and ability with which he advanced and defended the idea of State rights, took an advanced and consistent position in favor of Government aid in the building and maintaining of highways throughout the country, not only such highways as we now propose to construct as memorials to great men who have passed away, or as masterpieces of engineering skill, to be constructed for the sole purpose of being generally admired, and particularly to be used by automobilists touring the country; he advised and defended the use of money from the Federal Treasury for what we now call common country highways. Even a casual reading of history or a meager knowledge of constitutional interpretation by early statesmen who may very properly be credited with as much knowledge of the meaning of that document as statesmen of this late day possess, shows that the use of Federal money for public highways is and always has been considered a proper and worthy use of such money.

Both of the great political parties of the country at their national conventions, in 1908, declared unequivocally for the improvement and maintenance of country roads by the use of money from the Federal Treasury. The Republican national convention at Chicago declared as follows: "We recognize the social and economic advantages of good country roads, more and more largely at public expense and less and less at the expense of abutting property owners." The declaration of the Democratic convention at Denver is as follows: "We favor Federal aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads." So it is made clearly to appear by citation of early authority and by declarations of modern political tenets that Government aid is proper and necessary in the construction and maintenance of the highways of the country.

Even if my time were not limited, and even if I had prepared myself with facts and figures to give to the House, I should hesitate to speak at length on this subject in support of this amendment, because the need and value of good highways is so well known as to make extended argument in behalf of the policy of constructing and maintaining them altogether unnecessary. Study of the question of good roads or of the condition of the country where good roads have been denied to the people, impresses us with the stupendous loss the country has sustained on account of the condition of its highways.

A person is apt to look at local conditions only and to estimate the need or the value of an improvement by its effect upon him alone. One who takes this narrow view of the subject of good roads and the loss suffered as a result of failure or refusal of communities to construct and maintain good roads has little, if any, appreciation of the immense loss in the aggregate sustained by the country on account of the failure of proper governmental authorities to establish and maintain proper highways. It is estimated, conservatively I believe, that the loss to this country every year by reason of bad roads equals the national debt. On account of poor country roads it costs a farmer of Michigan more per bushel to deliver his wheat to his usual market than it costs per bushel to deliver wheat from New York to Liverpool. The Secretary of Agriculture places the annual loss to this country on account of poor roads at the sum of $350,000,000, but many believe that Speaker CLARK is nearer right when he says such annual loss is $800,000,000.

The value of each piece of farming land in this country is influenced by its distance from market and the facility with which crops can be transported. The value of every bushel or pound of a farmer's product is large or small depending upon the distance to market and the character of highways over which the product must be carried. And good country highways are valuable and helpful to a city as well as to the country around it. The value of every piece of city property is higher if the farming land about the city is good than if it is poor. The business of every merchant in a city is influenced by the condition of the roads leading to and from the farms in the territory tributary to the city.

The reasons for building and maintaining good roads are many and I might, if I had the time, speak of more of them. I simply wish to make my position clear. I believe one of the best ways a Government has of spending its money is in providing good highways and that no expenditure of money brings a better return. I believe there is no respect in which there is greater need of improvement than in the building of country roads. The Federal Government has abundant resources, has a perfect right to spend its money for roads, and local communities need the help this bill if enacted into law will give. There seems to be no reason for withholding the money, so I shall vote for the measure and sincerely hope it will soon be enacted into law.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to discuss especially the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN], but we are about to act upon a proposition which, to my mind, is of supreme importance to the country, and upon the general proposition I wish to be heard. The amendment to be voted upon makes it the duty of the United States to compensate for the use of highways over which rural mail is carried. As a member of the subcommittee which considered this bill in its original form, and as a member of the committee which reported it favorably to the House, I feel that I may be permitted to discuss its terms somewhat in detail. The bill proposes to classify roads over which rural mail is carried and to pay rent for the use of them as follows:

Class A shall embrace the highest type of roads in the country. Upon such a road the grade shall be no steeper than is reasonably necessary when the topography of the locality is considered; it shall be well drained, with a track not less than 9 feet wide, which shall be composed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam, and so graded and crowned as that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface. This is the class of road which falls within the macadam type, well known to the road engineers of the country.

Class B is the type of road which we know in our country as the sand-clay road, a type which has proven most satisfactory. This class shall embrace roads with a track not less than 9 feet in width, well drained, and built of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface.

The sand-clay type of road, coming into such general use in many of the States, can be built at a reasonable cost to the local community. If my recollection is correct, the sand-clay roads of Richland County in my district, admittedly the highest type of this character of road, have cost on an average not over $500 per mile. They are a cheap but most substantial kind of road.

Class C includes the ordinary dirt roads of the country, which have been provided with proper side ditches, and have been kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface, so as to be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times. This is the cheapest type of road that can be built; and yet it is the most important to the country of all types, because it is over such roads that the bulk of farm produce is hauled to market, and it is the prime purpose of this bill to encourage the construction of that type of road which most nearly meets the requirements and necessities of the man who lives remote from the town and the railroad and upon whom so heavily falls the burden of transporting his produce to market.

By the terms of this bill the Government using these classes of roads will be compelled to pay for the use of class A a per annum rental of $25 per mile; for class B, $20 per mile; for class C, $15 per mile. It will be observed that the highest rent is paid to the highest type of road, the purpose of this gradation being to encourage the lower type of road to bring itself within the higher class in order to receive the higher rental. The whole theory of this bill is to encourage the States and local communities to build better roads, coupled with the idea that the Government is able to pay for the use of State and local property.

In section 4 of the bill we have provided that the local officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways shall not be entitled to them except upon the condition that the highways have been made to fall within one or the other of the three classes of roads enumerated in the bill. We have inserted this provision for the purpose of adequately protecting the Government.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am very much in favor of this bill, but I would like to understand it a little better. To whom is this rental to be paid?

Mr. LEVER. The rental is to be paid, as provided in the bill, to the local officers in the various States who have control over the road funds. In my State it would be paid to the county supervisor. I believe in the gentleman's State—Missouri—it would be paid to the township commissioner or the county treasurer. But in any case, it goes to the local official who has charge of the highways.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this bill is simple and direct in its terms, it says on its face what it seeks to do, it is strong in the fact that it is candid in the expression of its intentions, and yet it is a most comprehensive and far-reaching proposition, whose ultimate benefit must be apparent to everyone.

The bill represents the combined judgment of a number of Representatives who have introduced bills on the subject of roads, and the almost unanimous opinion of the Committee on Agriculture, which considered them. The charge has been made in the course of the debate by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], I think, that this bill was considered hastily. There is no warrant in fact for such statement. I desire to say to him that the history of the bill is this:

A number of gentlemen—Representatives in Congress—appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and earnestly urged that committee to give consideration to this proposition. The committee decided to refer the whole matter to a subcommittee, consisting of Messrs. RUBEY, LEVER, BEALL, Democrats, and SIMMONS and HANNA, Republicans. The subcommittee from day to day gave earnest and careful consideration to every feature of the bill and a comparison of the original Shackleford bill referred to the subcommittee; and the bill reported to the full committee will demonstrate that the original bill was materially amended. The report of the subcommittee, with the amendments suggested by it, was approved by the full committee substantially as reported and is the bill under consideration at this time. The question for the committee to decide was, as it is for the House now to decide: Shall the Government embark upon the policy of paying the States and the local communities a reasonable rental for the use of their property? The committee had little difficulty in answering this question in the affirmative, for the committee was moved by a sense of justice and fair treatment to the States and local communities. This is the main point involved in this bill.

Mr. HILL. What do you say in regard to the amendment? Is there anything in that that could be duplicated?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to my friend from Connecticut that I could not hear the reading of the amendment.

Mr. HILL. The proposition is that it would prevent the use by two or three carriers of the same road and measuring up the mileage on each of them.

Mr. LEVER. I do not think there is anything in that proposition, for the reason that the compensation is so much per mile for mileage used, and I do not think there could be any duplication.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman is a member of the committee, is he not?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. HILL. He seems to have no doubt——

Mr. LEVER. I have no doubt in my own mind as to the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have 10 minutes more. He is a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to impose upon the patience of the committee, but I do wish to answer an objection raised by some gentlemen. It is the vital matter of the authority of the Federal Government over local roads.

This question can not be raised, for we have completely provided against it in the fact that we have refused emphatically in the terms of the bill to permit the Federal Government to say how this rental shall be used by the States and communities. That proposition was seriously before the committee, and the committee deliberately took the position that the Federal Government had no right to dictate the uses to which the States should apply the funds provided in the bill. The committee felt there was no more right to allow this to be done than it is for the Federal Government to compel the railroad companies, which it compensates for carrying the mails, to use such compensation in the maintenance and upkeep of their road beds and equipments. We are paying a quid pro quo, and it is none of the Government's business as to how the "quid" shall be used by those who receive it; it is enough to admit the justness of the proposition that the Federal Government should not be allowed to continue to use the property of the States without paying a just compensation for such use.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS]?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. The purpose of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] is to prevent the double payment for the use of the same strip of road—that is, where the carrier would double back on the same road. Now, does the gentleman pretend there is anything in this bill as it now stands that will prevent such double payment? If so, where is it?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that I did not at first catch the exact reading of the amendment, but I do not believe there is a possibility of a duplication of pay for the use of these rural roads.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman submit to a request to have the Clerk report the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan again? I do not believe that the members of the committee generally heard it.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to my friend the bill provides so much rental for the number of miles used; and I take it the Postmaster General, in drawing his warrants, would draw them with a view to prevent the duplication the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. WILLIS. Then I understand the gentleman to be opposed to such double payment as might be permitted if the Postmaster General did not so rule.

Mr. LEVER. I will say that I do not want a duplication of pay any more than does my friend. But I think the bill, if the gentleman will read it carefully, provides against that very contingency.

Mr. WILLIS. I have read it carefully. Will the gentleman point out the language? We want to find it.

Mr. LEVER. I will read:

For the purpose of transporting rural mails, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile for highways of class A, $20 per annum per mile for class B, $15 per annum per mile for highways of class C.

I think—in fact, I am sure—under that language the duplication which my friend from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] fears would be prevented. Keep in mind the word "highways" and give the language proper construction.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield further? This amendment simply makes that perfectly clear. Why will not the gentleman accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan? It makes it clear that there can be no duplication of pay.

Mr. LEVER. I think it is entirely clear now, and this bill has been so thoroughly considered that I am a little afraid of any amendment that might be put upon it unless I could study it very closely.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman permit the Clerk to read the amendment again?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to my friend I would like to proceed here.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman one question on this point?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina to explain why it would not be fair to duplicate? If the theory of this bill is for payment for the use of roads, it occurs to me that the carrier will make as many trips coming back as he would make going out, and he would use the road just as hard coming back as he would use it in going out. I would like to know the reason why the road should not be paid for twice if it is used twice?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Connecticut may be right about that and probably is, but that matter must be decided by this committee. I wish to proceed with the main discussion.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him with a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; though I should like to go along and discuss the main proposition.

Mr. MURDOCK. There are three possible duplications of measurement with respect to these roads, and I ask the question for the purpose of getting an explanation from the gentleman. The first would be a duplication by the rural service itself; the second would be a duplication by the star-route and rural services; and the third duplication would be a double measurement of the roads by including intersections twice. Now, taking the last proposition, does the gentleman think that the language employed in this section prohibits the double measurement of intersections of roads?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman that I think, as I said to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] a moment ago——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow one short interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] to the fact that the compensation here is not for the distance traveled, but so much for each mile of road that is used.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then the intersections will not be measured twice?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. No; they will not.

Mr. LEVER. As I pointed out to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] a moment ago, I do not think that there is any possibility of duplication here—the language of the bill is clear—the amount of mileage controls.

I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted, that if the Federal Government must use the roads of the State for transporting its mails upon them in carrying out its duty to the people to deliver to them their mail, then, it seems to me, that there can be no question as to the correctness of the principle which compels the Government to pay for the use of these roads. It must be borne in mind that, under the regulations of the Post Office Department, a reasonably good road, kept bridged, and in a reasonably good condition at all seasons of the year, is made a condition precedent to the establishment of a rural route.

Before the Government will perform its function of delivering mail at the doors of the people it requires these same people to put their roads in a prescribed condition. If the Government makes this requirement, is it not reasonable to suppose that the local communities, when they have brought their roads up to a condition even better than that required as a condition for the establishment of a rural route, should expect some compensation for their work? There are, approximately, 2,200,000 miles of roads of all classes in the United States, and according to the latest available information these roads are costing the States annually over a hundred and forty-two million dollars. Approximately 1,179,000 miles are being used by the Federal Government for transporting its mails. Why should not the Government pay for this use? Why should the States be forced to expend annually this enormous sum and permit the Government to use the roads without being entitled to some compensation? The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] have held up their hands in holy horror at the idea of the Government paying the States and local communities for its use of their property. I do not recall hearing these gentlemen protest against the payment of $50,000,000 annually to the railroads for transportation of mails; I heard nothing from them as to the payment of $725,000 to electric and cable cars for this service; and if they said anything about the payment of $3,322,000 for the transportation of foreign mail it has escaped my memory; nor have I heard them say anything with respect to the payment of $4,400,000 for rent for first, second, and third class post offices; nor have they complained loudly enough for anyone to hear them about the payment of $5,000,000 as rent for railway post-office car service; and certainly neither of these gentlemen has raised his voice against the appropriation of $966,000 for pneumatic-tube service, most of which, of course, is expended in the cities of Chicago and New York, from which these two gentlemen come.

I ask in all seriousness how gentlemen can distinguish in the principle which makes it necessary for the Government to pay for the use of property of individuals and corporations and the principle of paying the States and local communities for the use of their property? The distinction is to my mind unreasonable and can not be supported by any process of reasoning or rule of logical deduction.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. LEVER. I would like to get along, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Just at this point. The gentleman has given the measure a good deal of consideration, and the question I want to ask is this: Does the gentleman understand the bill to apply to star routes as well as to rural routes?

Mr. LEVER. Undoubtedly it does, or at least that is the intention of those of us who drew and considered the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman think it does apply?

Mr. LEVER. Undoubtedly. The Fourth Assistant Postmaster General was before the subcommittee, and upon that very point he informed us that rural mail as defined by the Post Office Department includes both star and rural routes.

Now, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], in conversation with me the other day, rather feared that this was not the case. But I will say positively that we had the absolute assurance of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General on the subject.

Mr. MONDELL. Then, would there be any objection to an amendment that would make that point clear?

Mr. LEVER. There would not be, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] proposes to offer such an amendment, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman that it will be entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. LLOYD. The term "rural mail" as used in the statute is determined only by Executive order, and the determination as to what rural mail will be under this bill will be made by the Secretary of Agriculture. The Postmaster General will have nothing to do with determining what rural mail is. Up to the present time there have been two classifications, and only two—the star route mail and the rural delivery mail.

Mr. LEVER. Of course, if there is any doubt on that proposition this committee will clear up the doubt by an amendment such as that to be offered by the gentleman from South Dakota and also the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY], who has an amendment on that proposition which doubtless will cover this point.

Mr. Chairman, let me hurry—the interruptions have taken most of my time. Who is fighting this bill? Gentlemen representing city districts; gentlemen who seem to forget that the cities which they represent are, after all, dependent upon the farms. Prosperity for the farm spells prosperity for the cities. Rural happiness means city contentment. The town and country are interdependent; the one can not prosper while the other fails to do so. These city gentlemen who oppose this bill are not representing the wishes of their people. The strongest sentiment in the country for road improvement comes from the far-seeing people of the cities who recognize the close relationship between the town and country. After all, the whole problem of better roads is involved in the larger problem of reduced transportation charges, which, to my mind, is the most important factor in the problem of the cost of living. Secretary Wilson estimates that it costs each person in the United States annually $3.50 on account of the bad condition of the roads in the country. This is approximately a tax, due to mud, of $300,000,000 annually, and this is a conservative estimate. The mud tax is even greater than the tariff tax complained of yesterday by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES]. I would remind him that while I agree that all of the people pay the tariff tax, he must agree that all of the people pay the mud tax.

The man in the city is not less immune to this burden than is the farmer, who must get his produce to market and haul his supplies and farm necessities from market to plantation over roads which, in many instances, are a disgrace to civilization. I know, Mr. Chairman, for I was reared on the farm, what the burden of bad roads means to a rural community, both in the way of actual cost in transportation and in inconvenience. Country homes are being emptied because of the inconveniences of country life. Rural communities are being depopulated because the glamor of the city and town is more attractive. The problem is not how to keep the boy on the farm, but it is how to make the farm profitable and attractive to the boy who stays upon it. Those who raise the cry of "back to the farm" do not know, can not appreciate what it means to drag, literally drag, produce from the farm to the market over roads axle deep in mud. The mud burden is a potent factor in our depleting rural population, and if by the adoption of a policy of fairness and equity to the States and local communities we can in a measure reduce this burden, as I am sure the provision of this bill will do, we who have had a part in bringing it to a favorable consideration may congratulate ourselves that we have pursued a policy of wise statesmanship.

This is a big movement, pregnant with great good to all the country, and the opposition to it is not surprising to me. I am somewhat familiar with my country's history, and in my own experience every great step forward in the interest of the people has met and has had to overcome the bitterest and most unrelenting antagonism, but in the end the righteousness of right has triumphed, and as a result we have our agricultural colleges and experiment stations, our pure-food and meat-inspection laws, and our rural mail-delivery service; and if I read the temper of this House correctly, we are going to take the next step which must result in such an era in road building as this country has never seen before.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEVER. I am much obliged to the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I have not been particularly interested in the details of the amendments that have been proposed to this proposition, nor have I been particularly interested in the details of the proposition itself, because, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the use of Federal funds in the construction of highways in any shape, form, or fashion.

I do not know whether that is a popular position or not, but that is the position which I have always taken here and which I have always taken at home. I know, as every gentleman on this floor must know, that every dollar which is put into the construction or paid for rent of roads must come out of the taxpayers of the country, and where that dollar is collected and distributed through the Federal entity it will cost the taxpayers three for one.

I know that it is not commonly esteemed a very popular thing to oppose an appropriation out of the Federal Treasury. This is a result of our indirect system of taxation. Gentlemen are elected to the legislatures of the States. They go to attend the session. They return home, and their constituents meet them with a cold gleam in the eye and say, "Here, how much did you spend?" A Member of Congress, elected by that same constituency, returns to his home and they meet him with the same cold gleam in the eye, but the question is, "How much did you get?" [Laughter.] So far as I am concerned, I repeat again that I am opposed to any proposition in any shape, form, or fashion that takes money out of the Federal Treasury and puts it into highways. [Applause.] I know that the building of roads is a local question. I know that ninety-nine one-hundredths of the use of the roads is by local people. It is not a Federal question. There is no constitutional objection to it, of course. It is a question of expediency. But let gentlemen stop and consider what they are costing the taxpayers in making an appropriation out of the Federal Treasury. You vote here a dollar to build a road or to pay rent for a road, and for every dollar you vote out of the pockets of your constituents, who could pay it directly, if they desired to do so, through their local agencies, you are spending three dollars that will not go into the Treasury, but will go into the coffers of private individuals.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. I ask one minute more.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARRETT. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. I agree with the gentleman. I want to ask this question: If the title to the public roads of the various States does not belong to the States, and if it is not proper at least to inquire of the legislatures of those States whether they desire to demand of the Government rent for the use of those roads for carrying the mails over them? We have no such suggestion from anybody here.

Mr. GARRETT. Technically I should say that it is not true that the roads belong to the States in all the States. The roads belong to the people of the localities, the counties in the State, or the municipalities, and are held in trust——

Mr. BARTLETT. The title to the road is in the State, and that has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. The title to the road is in the State, and the duty to open work and operate them and keep them in order devolves upon the counties and municipal subdivisions of the State.

Mr. GARRETT. Of course, there may be differences in the holdings of the courts of the different States, but I will say to the gentleman that I think the idea involved here is an erroneous idea.

Mr. BARTLETT. So do I.

Mr. GARRETT. We speak of the Federal Government as using the roads. What is the Federal Government? Certainly it is the creation of the people. What is a rural route for? Is it for the benefit of an entity far away from the people known as the Federal Government? No, no. A rural route is for the benefit of the people who live along that route.

Mr. FRANCIS. And so is any other improvement for the benefit of the people which is paid for out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly; but let me say to the gentleman that I have stood upon this creed all my life. I may be wrong about it, but I am not going to turn my back now on such teachings as those for which I have always stood. During all my public career I have stood upon this proposition, that every power which can be as well exercised by the State or by the locality should be exercised by it, and that the arm of the Federal Government should not be extended except where the arm of the State or the locality can not reach. [Applause.]

Mr. SAUNDERS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. All of us unreservedly accept the proposition which the gentleman has just stated as a constitutional doctrine, but is it proposed here on behalf of this bill to interfere in any wise with the discharge of that local and communal function?

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, I do not think so.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Then the principle announced by the gentleman does not apply here.

Mr. GARRETT. I have already stated that there is no constitutional question involved, in my opinon; but there is involved a question of expediency, and there is involved a question of indirect taxation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not believe the gentleman from Tennessee quite understood all the question of the gentleman from Virginia. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee to say that wherever a thing may be as well done by the State or local government as it can be done by the Federal Government the gentleman's political convictions demands that it shall be done by the local or State government.

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Very well. Is there any question in the mind of anybody that roads can not be constructed by localities, by counties, and by States just as well as they can be by the Federal Government?

Mr. GARRETT. I do not know whether there is a question in the mind of anybody, but there is no question in my mind.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. In that connection, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Could not the various municipalities all over the United States build and maintain their post offices as well as the Federal Government could?

Mr. GARRETT. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The post office is essentially a Federal function though.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. On the gentleman's reasoning, should not the localities build their own post offices, because they can do it as well as the Federal Government can?

Mr. GARRETT. I should not object to it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is the gentleman in favor of it?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just taken his seat States that there is no question but that this amendment is constitutional. That being granted, I take no stock in the arguments made by him against the amendment on the ground of expediency. He bases his argument against the amendment on the fact that it will place burdens upon the taxpayers of the Nation. I realize that that is true, but those very taxpayers are the ones who are demanding almost unanimously that a bill of this kind be enacted into law. All taxes are burdens, but if the money is spent for the benefit of the people they do not mind paying taxes. What they object to is the expenditure of money for purposes that do not benefit them.

I stand here, Mr. Chairman, representing a constituency that is favorable to legislation of this character. It is the duty of a Congressman to faithfully represent the sentiment of this constituency. I shall always stand ready to vote for any measure that they want, if I believe that it is right and does not violate the Constitution. There is no question but that a very large per cent of the people of this Nation favor this legislation. They want it. It is agreed that it is constitutional. Why not let him have it?

We hear no such argument as that made by the gentleman when the rivers and harbors bill is before us, or the public buildings bill or many other appropriation bills are to be voted on. But when it comes to a time that the people who travel the country roads demand legislation then we hear objections coming from different quarters, some for one reason and some for another. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] stated that this was a new and curious principle, something new under the sun, a new departure. Surely he has not read the legislation of the country upon the subject of roads. We find that many States in this Union have received appropriations from time to time in the early history of this country for the very purpose of building good roads. It seems to me that this is a policy advocated by the Democratic Party. It was stated in our last national platform that we favor the construction and maintenance of post roads. On yesterday I voted for what is called the Sims amendment. I am willing not only to vote for the Shackleford amendment, but to go further, and that this Government not only pay for the use of roads, but also for the construction of roads.

Mr. Chairman, while the proposed amendment does not go as far as I would like to have it go, I shall give it my support, hoping and believing that if this step is taken that ere long we will go further in this most important matter.

The amendment reads as follows:

That for the purposes of this act certain highways of the several States and the civil subdivisions thereof are classified as follows:

Class A shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide, composed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam, graded, crowned, compacted, and maintained in such manner that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface, and all other roads having a road track not less than 9 feet wide, of a construction equally smooth, firm, durable, and expensive, and continuously kept in proper repair. Class B shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide, composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface. Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface, by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times. That whenever the United States shall use any highway of any State or civil subdivision thereof which falls within classes A, B, or C for the purpose of transporting rural mail, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile for highways of class A, $20 per annum per mile for highways of class B, and $15 per annum per mile for highways of class C. The United States shall not pay any compensation or toll for such use of such highways other than that provided for in this section, and shall pay no compensation whatever for the use of any highway not falling within classes A, B, or C. That any question arising as to the proper classification of any road used for transporting rural mail shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. That the compensation herein provided for shall be paid at the end of each fiscal year by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Postmaster General to the officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act.

The provisions of this paragraph shall go into effect on the 1st day of July, 1913.

This amendment has met with opposition, but this opposition comes mainly from those who represent city districts, and the reason given for it is that the matter of building roads is a State function, and that therefore the Federal Government should have nothing to do with matters of this kind.

It is charged that this is a piece of paternalism; if so, it is no more of a crime to paternalize the highways of the country than it is its rivers and harbors, its vast areas of unirrigated desert, and many other lines of internal development. Fabulous millions have been spent upon the rivers and harbors of our country. The railroad corporations have applied to the Government, and over 200,000,000 acres of our public domains have been bestowed upon these corporations to aid them in their construction of these mighty lines of transportation. Vast sums of money have been spent in the erection of towering monuments and splendid public buildings all over the country. Congress has responded to these demands, and no question of paternalism has been raised.

There is no argument that can be made for those things that does not apply with greater force in the question of the construction of public highways.

It is not proposed by this bill that the Federal Government shall engage in the building of roads. The bill does not go that far, but it simply provides for the payment of an annual rental for the use of public roads.

If it provided for the building of public highways I should vote for it, because I believe that it is right and that it is constitutional.

The Constitution says that Congress shall have the power to establish post offices and post roads. Under this authority post-office buildings have been erected at a cost of millions of dollars. Yet it is argued that we have no right under the Constitution to extend Federal aid in the construction of roads. The word "establish," when referring to post-office buildings, is held to mean that such houses can be erected, but when post offices are to be established it is contended that it means that the Government shall designate over what road the mail shall be carried, and that the Government has no right to build roads.

I submit that, as the right to establish post offices and post roads is given in the same sentence, that as the language makes no distinction between the right in regard to offices and roads, this shows clearly that it is not intended by the framers of the Constitution that "establish" should be given one construction when referring to post offices and a different and more restricted construction when referring to post roads.

That Congress has the right to extend aid in the matter of constructing and maintaining public highways is shown by decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, from which I quote:

Without authority in Congress to establish and maintain such highways and bridges, it would be without authority to regulate one of the most important adjuncts of commerce. This power in former times was exerted to a very limited extent, the Cumberland or national Road being the most notable instance. Its extension was but little called for, as commerce was then mostly conducted by water, and many of our statesmen entertained doubts as to the existence of the power to establish ways of communication by land. But since, in consequence of the expansion of the country, the multiplication of its products, and the invention of railroads and locomotion by steam, land transportation has so vastly increased, a sounder consideration of the subject has prevailed and led to the conclusion that Congress has plenary power over the whole subject. (California v. Pacific Railroad Co., 127 U. S., 1, le, 39.)

Also:

Congress has likewise the power, exercised early in this century by successive acts in the Cumberland or National Road, from the Potomac across the Alleghanies to the Ohio, to authorize the construction of a public highway connecting several States. (Lucton v. North River Bridge Co., 153 U. S., 525–529; Indiana v. U. S., 148 U. S., 148.)

That the Federal Government has the right to extend aid in the construction of roads was recognized by Jefferson when he said:

During peace we may chequer our whole country with canals, roads, and so forth. This is the object to which all of our endeavors should be directed.

Again, he said:

The fondest wish of my heart ever was that the surplus portion of these taxes should be applied in time of peace to the improvement of our country by canals, roads, and useful institutions.

Henry Clay was always an advocate of internal improvements, and was in his day the ablest and most persistent advocate of the building of national roads. He said:

Of all the modes in which a Government can employ its surplus revenue, none is more permanently beneficial than that of internal improvements. Fixed to the soil, it becomes a durable part of the land itself, diffusing comfort and activity and animation on all sides. The first direct effect is on the agricultural community, into whose pockets comes the difference in the expense for transportation between good and bad ways.

Some have argued that this is a subject over which the States have absolute control, and raise the question of State rights. One of the greatest advocates of the State rights doctrine was John C. Calhoun. He saw no encroachment upon the doctrine by Federal aid to roads. While Secretary of War, in a report to the House on the roads and canals, he said:

No object of the kind is more important, and there is none to which State or individual capacity is more inadequate. It must be perfected by the General Government or not be perfected at all, at least for many years.

Again he said:

Let it not be said that internal improvement may be wholly left to the enterprise of the States and of individuals.

It is interesting to note that in the early days of our country's history Congress did appropriate money for the purpose of building roads. In 1806 Congress authorized the construction of a road from Maryland, known as the Cumberland Road, and various appropriations for it were made from time to time, aggregating about $7,000,000. In 1811, 5 per cent of the sales of public land in Louisana were given by Congress to that State for the building of roads and levees; in 1816 a like amount of a similar fund was given to Indiana for roads and canals; and in 1817 a like sum was given to my own State, Mississippi, for this purpose; in 1818, 2 per cent of a similar fund was given to Illinois for roads; in 1819, 5 per cent to Alabama; in 1820, 5 per cent to Missouri; and in 1845, 5 per cent to Iowa.

Congress also appropriated money for a road from Georgia to New Orleans, and one from Nashville, Tenn., to Natchez, Miss., as well as many other public highways.

I think it has been thoroughly shown that Congress not only has the power but has frequently exercised the power to contribute to the construction of roads; however, this bill does not authorize the construction of roads, but simply provides for the payment of a fixed rental on all roads used by the Federal Government in carrying the mail, if the road comes up to a certain fixed standard It is but right that the Government should pay for anything that it uses, and in doing this it will encourage the people in the States to improve their roads.

I realize, Mr Chairman, that there has been so much written and spoken upon the subject of good roads that there is little, if anything, new to be said. If I needed any excuse for speaking on this occasion it would be that it ofttimes requires a repeated statement of facts to get it firmly fixed in our minds and to arouse us to the necessity for action.

As I have said, a good deal of opposition to this measure comes from Representatives of city districts. It is a mistaken idea that no one but the farmer gets the benefit of good roads. Every citizen of this Republic will derive direct benefit from the improvement of the roads of the country, because the products of the farm must be conveyed over country roads to market, and the consumer must bear a part of the burden that is laid upon the producer because of bad roads. Even the railroads are interested in good wagon roads, because of the fact that in many sections of the country, owing to bad conditions of the roads, the farmer is forced to convey his products to the market at such time as he may be able to find the roads suitable for travel, thereby placing most of the agricultural products for transportation within a limited time. The farmer is also interested for the same reason; that is, that he is forced to sell his products within the same limited time.

We have heard much comment upon the fact that people are leaving the farm and congregating in the towns and cities. One cause of this has been the bad condition of the roads. In my judgment, there is nothing that will tend more to the upbuilding of the country, making farm life more attractive, than the improvement of the roads. There is no phase of life, either social or economic, which is not affected by good roads. The value of lands, the attendance of children at school, the social relations of the community are all affected by roads. Good roads make social intercourse and communication between farm and town less difficult, thus destroying the isolation of farm life, especially in the winter season. They increase the productive area by making lands that have not been cultivated more accessible. They increase values of property, reduce the cost of transportation, cause greater interest to be taken in farming, thereby increasing the general prosperity of the country.

On the question of the cost of transportation I submit the following table, prepared by one who has given the subject much study. If a horse could pull on a level 1,000 pounds, on a rise of—

1 foot in—	Pounds.
100 feet the horse draws	900
50 feet the horse draws	810
44 feet the horse draws	750
40 feet the horse draws	720
30 feet the horse draws	640
25 feet the horse draws	540
24 feet the horse draws	500
20 feet the horse draws	400
10 feet the horse draws	250

This gives an idea of the importance of grades in road building.

Improved roads are breeders of traffic. It is generally found that new industries, new and greater production, spring up upon the line of well-built roads, which increase commerce and enlarge business.

On the other hand, bad roads keep a community from developing and cause material loss in many ways. There are no statistics which show the loss to the farmer due merely to the greater cost of transportation over bad roads, but the loss must be enormous; in fact, it is estimated that it amounts to many millions of dollars each year. As I have said, every citizen is directly interested in improving the roads of the country; that the farmer is not the only one benefited, but if he were I should vote to improve the roads of the country, because he is the first and most important producer of wealth and he has a right to insist that a portion of the money that he pays to the Government shall be returned to him by way of benefits from the Government.

I care nothing for the suggestion made that a few great highways be built from one end of the country to the other, because I believe that that will be very largely for the benefit of those who desire to take pleasure trips in automobiles, and that those who are entitled to the benefits of good roads, or a very few of them at least, would receive no benefit whatever. Rather do I prefer to expend money in order to bring the farmer in closer touch with the towns and the town man in closer touch with the farmer to the mutual benefit of each.

Charles Sumner once said, "The road and the schoolmaster are the two most important agents in advancing civilization." Education, civilization, commerce, social intercourse, prosperity, and happiness are all promoted by good roads. History discloses that no nation has ever achieved permanent greatness without good roads. No community which has good roads would be willing to surrender them if the cost of construction were repaid, because everybody gets a benefit from the road, all enjoy and participate in their advantages and blessings.

Mr. Chairman, I know of no better way to pay a tribute to good roads than to quote from a report of the National Good Roads Association, written nearly 10 years ago:

They economize time, labor, and money; save worry, waste, and force; they aid the social and religious advancement of the people; they increase the value of property and aid every avocation, and especially that of agriculture; they mean the ability at all times to move maximum burdens at a minimum cost; they permit the transportation of marketable products during bad weather, when no work can be done on the farm; they save the wear and tear on horses, drivers, harness, and wagons. Good roads are the avenue of progress; the best proof of intelligence; the ligaments that bind the country together in the bonds of patriotism and thrift; they are the woof of sentiment woven into the great web of our civilization; they are to the body politic what the venous system is to the human body. Without it stagnation and decay follow; with it all forms of growth, strength, and beauty prevail. Good roads are the initial fountains of commerce; the rivulets that swell the great streams that flow out of every country and distribute the products of our fields, factories, forests, and mines. They will do more to extend trade and commerce of the country; will add more to the happiness, intelligence, and prosperity of the people, and will contribute more to their social elevation and moral strength than any other material thing whatever.

Mr. Chairman, believing, as I do, that Congress has the right to appropriate money for this purpose and that it ought to do so, I trust that this House will not be derelict in its duty, but will pass this bill, which will prove beneficial to every citizen, whether he dwell on the farm, in the town, or in the city. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan to the amendment be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting between the words "rural" and "mail" the words "and star route," wherever they occur in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the Shackleford amendment by striking out the word "twenty-five," in line 23, and all of lines 24 and 25, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "For all highways which shall at the passage of this act be included in any of the foregoing classes, $5 per annum per mile for highways in class A; $3 per annum per mile for highways of class B; and $2 per annum per mile for highways in class C; and for all highways which shall after the passage of this act be so improved as to be brought within either classes A, B, or C, $40 per annum per mile for highways in class A; $35 per annum per mile for highways in class B; and $30 per mile for highways in class C."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the members of the committee fully understand the amendment which I have presented. I believe it possesses some real merit. That we may have this matter fully before us, I wish to present the pending proposition. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] offered an amendment to H. R. 21279 which provides for national aid for good roads throughout the various States of the Union.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD's amendment in full is as follows:

That for the purposes of this act certain highways of the several States, and the civil subdivisions thereof, are classified as follows:

Class A shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide composed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam, graded, crowned, compacted, and maintained in such manner that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface, and all other roads having a road track not less than 9 feet wide of a construction equally smooth, firm, durable, and expensive, and continuously kept in proper repair. Class B shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface. Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times. That whenever the United States shall use any highway of any State, or civil subdivision thereof, which falls within classes A, B, or C, for the purpose of transporting rural mail, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile for highways of class A, $20 per annum per mile for highways of class B, and $15 per annum per mile for highways of class C. The United States shall not pay any compensation or toll for such use of such highways other than that provided for in this section, and shall pay no compensation whatever for the use of any highway not falling with classes A, B, or C. That any question arising as to the proper classification of any road used for transporting rural mail shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. That the compensation herein provided for shall be paid at the end of each fiscal year by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Postmaster General to the officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act.

The provisions of this paragraph shall go into effect on the 1st day of July, 1913.

I am in favor of national aid to encourage the construction of better highways throughout the various States of the Union. I do not believe the proposition presented in the foregoing amendment is the best good-roads provision that could be provided. In my opinion, it should be amended so as to make it more fair and equitable, and especially so that the money paid out of the National Treasury to aid in the cause of good roads throughout the Union will contribute largely to the construction of additional good roads. The proposition as presented to us may, in a manner, reward the people of the States who have been diligent in constructing good roads in the past, but it does not seem to me to offer proper inducement for the construction of additional good roads in the future.

The amendment which I offer is as follows:

For all highways which shall at the passage of this act be included in any of the foregoing classes, $5 per annum per mile for highways of class A, $3 per annum per mile for highways of class B, and $2 per annum per mile for highways of class C, and for all highways which shall, after the passage of this act, be so improved as to be brought within either class A, B, or C, $40 per annum per mile for highways of class A, $35 per annum per mile for highways of class B, and $30 per annum per mile for highways of class C.

In the report of the Office of Public Roads of the United States Department of Agriculture on mileage and cost of public roads in the United States in 1909, issued as House Document No. 582, Sixty-second Congress, there is given the facts relative to the mileage and cost of good roads in the various States of the Union. This report shows that there is a wide difference in the mileage of improved roads in the various States of the Union. Indiana leads all other States in her mileage of improved roads which would come under classes A and B, as provided in the foregoing amendment. This State is shown by this report to have 24,955 miles of improved roads that would come under classes A and B. Ohio stands next in line with 24,106 miles. New York is next with 12,787 miles. Wisconsin follows New York with 10,167 miles. Kentucky follows next in the amount of her mileage with 10,114 miles. Illinois follows Kentucky with 8,914 miles. California has the next largest mileage with 8,587. There are many States in which the mileage of improved roads that would come under classes A and B is very limited, indeed. Among these may be mentioned the following: Arizona, 273; Colorado, 320; Delaware, 186; Idaho, 510; Kansas, 374; Louisiana, 329; Mississippi, 342; Montana, 95; Nebraska, 248; Nevada, 46; New Mexico, 104; North Dakota, 140; Oklahoma, 361; South Dakota, 286; Wyoming, 416.

No one of these 12 States has as much as 500 miles of improved roads that would come under classes A and B. The report of the Agricultural Department to which I refer does not show the mileage of public highways which would come under class C according to the classification provided in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

I take it that the primary object, the main purpose, of this proposition is to encourage the improvement of the public highways of this great Nation. I believe that is indeed a great object and a most worthy purpose. The object to be accomplished is indeed so great that I for one am willing to vote national aid to this great purpose. But I think the primary object is to improve roads which are not now improved. The National Government can not build our public highways, but the National Government may well vote aid to encourage the building of highways. In this great cause the National Government should encourage the State, should encourage the county, and encourage the smaller civil subdivisions to improve their public highways. Under this bill we have three classes of public highways, A, B, and C. For rental of these roads we are to pay $25, $20, and $15 per mile annually—an average of $20 per mile. Under my amendment I reduce the amount to be paid on existing roads to $5 per mile for class A, $3 for class B, and $2 for class C. The average rate will be $3.33 per mile. The average cost per mile under the Shackleford amendment is $20 per mile. In other words, if the pending Shackleford amendment would cost $18,000,000 per annum for roads that now come within classes A, B, and C, under my amendment to the amendment we would spend but $3,000,000 annually as rent for roads which now come within classes A, B, and C. But I would pay a much higher rate of rental for highways constructed in the future. My amendment provides for the payment of $40 per mile for roads which shall hereafter be constructed and brought within class A, $35 per mile for roads brought within class B, and $30 per mile for roads which shall be brought within class C in the future. Such a law will be an encouragement to the States and various civil subdivisions to build new roads. Mr. Chairman, if we are to take this great advanced step, and the National Government shall appropriate money out of the Federal Treasury to improve highways, we ought to do it along some line and under some system whereby for every dollar we appropriate we will encourage the States to appropriate many additional dollars for good-road purposes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will ask the gentleman if he does not think his amendment would be an unjust discrimination against those localities which already have spent their money in improving their roads?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think it would be. On the other hand, I think the present amendment—the Shackleford amendment—is unjust in itself. For instance, the State of Indiana, under the Shackleford amendment, has enough existing highways coming within the three classes, if there were rural routes on all of them, to draw half a million dollars per annum from the National Treasury, while Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, and many other States would draw less than $10,000 a year. Indiana has as many miles of highways that would come under classes A and B as the combined mileage in 24 other States. Indiana has built her roads, and we honor her people for the enterprise they have displayed. I am a native of the State of Indiana, and I am proud of my birthplace.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two or three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORGAN. Indiana has constructed her roads under the law as it existed in the past. She has gotten dollar for dollar for every cent she has expended in them, and more, too. Now, what I want to do is to encourage the people of the United States to build additional good roads. I want this appropriation to be a matter of education to the great citizenship in the building of good roads. I want to pursue a policy that will encourage and stimulate the people to build good roads. Under the Shackleford amendment the bulk of the money appropriated from the National Treasury would go to the older States. Under the provision of my amendment every State would have a fair chance. All would be duly rewarded for their industry and enterprise in the future.

I do not know why we should pass a law in the interest of good roads in the United States and base our appropriations upon what the States have done in days gone by. On the other hand, it seems to me but just and fair and equitable to give a reward for what shall be done in the future.

I have heretofore indicated my willingness to vote national aid to good roads. Whether or not my amendment shall be adopted, I shall vote for the best proposition I can get. Good roads are of benefit to all classes of people. Producers and consumers alike are benefited. People in the city and people in the country share equally in the good results of good roads. Nothing will contribute more to the advancement of the farm than improvement in our highways; and nothing will contribute more to the safety and future welfare of the whole country than the upbuilding of the farm and the increase of the advantages on the farm. It is for these reasons that I am willing to vote money out of the National Treasury to improve our roads.

[Mr. BEALL of Texas addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that all debate on the pending amendment has been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the proposed amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is an amendment in the third degree and not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It is in respect of the point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. The point is that the debate has not been conducted on the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN]. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] was not recognized to speak in opposition to that amendment, but to the whole bill. I rise to ask recognition to speak in opposition to the Morgan amendment. There has been no speech in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman should have made a point of order if he desires to avail himself of that privilege.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The gentleman from Texas was recognized to speak on the whole bill. He did not speak in opposition to the amendment. I wish to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair sustains the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and the question is——

Mr. SAUNDERS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute to refer to the statements and arguments of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] in support of his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] asks unanimous consent to speak for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent as a member of this committee to reply, because the gentleman from Texas, who is also a member of the committee——

Mr. MANN. Do it on the next amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I wish simply to say this, that the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is totally opposed and antagonistic to the theory upon which the present bill is constructed. It is destructive of it, and I hope that all the friends of the good-roads bill will vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 7, line 23, Shackleford amendment, by inserting after the word "times" the following:

"Class D shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practically necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, so constructed and kept in such repairs and condition that they shall be reasonably passable for wagons and other wheeled vehicles at all times; and the United States shall pay $5 per annum per mile for the use of such highways when used and for the time used by the United States Government in carrying or transporting United States rural mail; and the money so paid to the local officers entitled to the custody of same shall be used by them within one year thereafter in the repair, maintenance, and improvement of the road or highway on which and for the rental of which said money was paid."

Mr. POWERS. It will be seen that the amendment which I propose adds an additional class of roads—a class of roads below and inferior to class C. The Shackleford amendment provides that $15 per mile per annum shall be paid by the Government for the use of class C roads. My amendment to the amendment provides that for class D roads only $5 per annum per mile shall be paid. The class D roads include roads which are at all times reasonably passable for wagons and wheeled vehicles. My judgment is, Mr. Chairman, that the scale of payment of class A and class B and class C roads should be cut in two—about half—and that class D should be included in the class of roads to be paid for by the Federal Government for its use. Under the Shackleford amendment $25 per annum per mile are to be paid for class A roads, $20 per mile for class B, and $15 per mile for class C.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWERS. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. In the Shackleford measure each one of the classes of roads, roads of each class, as a road measure, are ditched. Now, does the gentleman contemplate having class D roads, as he provides for, also ditched?

Mr. POWERS. No; I do not. In many instances this can not be successfully done.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman mean to say that the gentleman's amendment is to be ditched? [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. It may be. [Laughter.]

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. It includes all classes of roads not included in classes A, B, and C?

Mr. POWERS. Class D includes roads only of that character which are reasonably passable at all times by wagons and wheeled vehicles. And there is another distinction between class D roads and those provided for by the Shackleford amendment. All the moneys which are paid by the Federal Government for class D roads are to be used by the local officers for the proper repair and maintenance and improvement of class D roads. The Shackleford bill does not contain that character of a provision for the use of the money so paid to the local authorities; and I can readily see the reason for that provision, although it is contended by gentlemen that this money is to be so used. So far as I am individually concerned, I do not so construe the language of the bill.

But from my viewpoint it does not make any material difference, so far as that class of roads is concerned, because, before the Federal Government has to pay this money, classes A, B, and C have to be brought up to and kept up to a certain standard of efficiency or proficiency by the local authorities. Whether that standard of proficiency is brought about by the money paid by the Federal Government to the local authorities or whether that degree of proficiency is brought about by local taxation or by digging the roads themselves, to me is not material, although I would like to see the money paid by the Government put back into the roads. The fact, however, remains that those roads have got to be up to this class of proficiency and this class of perfection before the Federal Government is required to pay any money for the use thereof. And why should we not have class D? These roads have got to be kept up by the local authorities, the same as classes A, B, and C.

Class D roads includes that great bulk of roads of this country which need improvement most. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the Shackleford amendment and amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] moves that all debate on the Shackleford amendment and all amendments thereto be closed in 30 minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, one of the main objections, it seems to me, that has been urged against this proposition is that the Government should not expend this money for the benefit of the mail service. It seems to me that those who are opposing this bill, or the Shackleford amendment, forget the amount of money that the Government has expended in the improvement of rivers for the purpose of carrying the mail. They forget the amount of money that has been expended in the cities for caring for and handling the mail.

They say that the cities pay millions of dollars toward the support of the Government. They forget that over three-fourths of that money comes from the country, sent in there to send the merchandise out. The mail carriers deliver their mail at the door and in the house, where the rural-delivery carrier does not. He leaves the mail at the roadside where the boxes are, along the road, and every man that gets his mail has to travel from his home to that box, which may be from 100 yards to three-quarters of a mile or 3 miles distant, and sometimes 5 miles to the box where the rural mail has been delivered. The gentlemen who live in the large cities and who are opposing this bill forget that, and, in addition to that, they get their mail in the cities seven or eight times in a day and these people in the country get theirs but once a day, and sometimes only twice or three times a week. Of course, it depends somewhat on the location. Then when you get to the star-route service, which is about one-third of the amount involved in this bill, the people who are served by that means get their mail once a day, sometimes once in two days, and they have to go to the post office to get their mail, and do not have it delivered at their homes.

And now I want to say a word for a few moments in reply to the statement made by my learned and distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. BEALL]. He says that there is no demand for this legislation. He says that the people have not appeared before the committees of the House and demanded it or urged it. The people had the right to believe, when the Democratic Party put in their platform a declaration to the effect that they were in favor of improving good roads and assisting in giving better transportation, that that pledge would be carried out. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And the people who sent here the Members sitting on the other side of the House also had the right to believe that if the Republican Members were elected they would come to this House and give them relief. The people of the country did not believe that when they sent in all 393 Members to this House it would be necessary for them to write letters and file petitions and send telegrams and to come here in person. They believed that they had these Representatives here to appear before the committees, demanding and asking that their rights should be considered. Now the gentleman from Texas says, "Why this change?"

Away back in 1860 and 1865 and 1870 this Congress was always busy donating empires to the railroad companies, giving them free land, areas almost the size of States, and there was not any question as to the railroads.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. RAKER. I regret that I have not the time. Under any other circumstances I would yield. To-day the people are in the saddle. [Applause on the Democratic side.] To-day their Representatives are here asking that, instead of donating to the railroads all the time, giving the railroads consideration, you give the people some consideration in relation to the building up of the roads, so that the wants of the people, the desires of the people, may be considered, and in order that they might have an inning at this time.

That is the reason behind the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is the reason why the changed conditions have been brought about in this House, and we find in this body to-day over three-fourths of its membership in favor of the Shackleford amendment. Why? They have assured their people at home that they were in favor of it. They are here to carry out that pledge, and it does not need men from all over this country to appear before the committee for that purpose. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that all debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HARDY. My understanding was that we had 30 minutes on the Shackleford amendment. I wish to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order of the gentleman from Illinois is that debate on the pending amendment, which is the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS], has expired. That point of order is sustained.

Mr. CANDLER. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry. Did the gentleman offer an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas offer an amendment?

Mr. TAGGART. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. I simply desire to have an amendment pending, so that we can make a point of order when the debate on it is exhausted.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time in more than half a century that a measure has been proposed in this House for the particular benefit of the rural population.

An impression is abroad in the land that a majority of the people of the United States live in cities. This is contradicted by the latest statistics gathered by the Census; for it appears that 46.3 per cent of the people live in cities and towns containing more than 2,500 inhabitants, and that 53.7 per cent referred to as urban population live either on farms or in towns and villages of less than 2,500 inhabitants, and nearly all of the 53.7 per cent are interested in agriculture, and particularly interested in the improvement of public roads.

The rural population of every land is that portion of the population which is the least expensive to the Government, and at the same time is the most reliable source of the revenue of the Government.

It was never supposed that a farmer's business required the direct protection of the Government; armies were not raised and navies were not organized to protect his farm. In the whole history of our people the armed forces of the Government were never called upon to suppress an insurrection of farmers. The judicial branch of the Government is very far from the farmer; the United States courts are strangers to him. Not one farmer in 10,000 enters a United States court in any other capacity than as a juror or as a witness.

The amount of money spent by the Department of Agriculture is a mere trifle compared with the vast outlay of the Government. Seventeen and one-half millions of dollars, compared with the total $726,000,000 of ordinary disbursements, represents the proportion of the expenditures devoted to agriculture last year.

And yet through all the years the American farmer has uncomplainingly borne his share of the burden of the Government. He has been appealed to in the name of patriotism to vote for protection. It was represented to him that to protect American labor and American industries, he should be willing to pay somewhat more for the articles protected. Out of the generosity of his heart he was willing to pay exorbitant prices in order that American industry might flourish. In all history there is nothing so unselfish as the unremitting support that he has given to protect and establish American industries.

In the last few years, however, the American farmer has been reflecting very seriously on the expediency or the necessity of voting advantages to any branch of industry. He knows now that the tariff acts which were voted in the name of American labor and American industry were simply privileges that were granted by Congress to manufacturers. The whole scheme of that legislation was to stimulate the generosity of employers of American labor. Under that legislation industry flourished, but the princely sums that were derived from the privileges granted were not paid to labor and were never returned except by what was called "general prosperity" to the farmers of the country whose votes made such legislation possible. The vast results flowing from the advantages enjoyed under this legislation were not divided among those who did the work, but were amassed in fortunes which, to use an expression from John J. Ingalls, "dizzy the arithmetic of the imagination."

The rural people have also begun to realize that for every dollar collected upon foreign imports an indefinite sum that can never be calculated is charged as an extra price for home manufacturers. Of course, Edmund Burke said that "we can tax the shirt off a man's back, if we do it indirectly," and, after all, perhaps it is well that a part of the revenues of this Government are collected by duties on imports.

But I actually believe that if the whole expense to the people of partly maintaining the Government by collection of import duties was all calculated and all known, that, with the exception of luxuries which only the wealthy purchase and who prize them for the very prices they are obliged to pay for them, no duty would remain on any imported article, and no man would dare risk his reputation by advocating a tax of any kind on the common necessaries of everyday life.

Gentlemen here have mentioned that the Democratic Party is committed to the doctrine of "tariff for revenue only." Mr. Chairman, any man who uses that antiquated expression at this date demonstrates his mental incapacity to invent a new joke. I say to you that it would be impossible to collect the revenues necessary to conduct this Government by levying on imports a tariff "for revenue only." A tariff that is too high does not produce revenue. The duty on blankets furnishes a notable example of this, for it has produced no revenue to speak of in more than 20 years.

If a tariff were too low, it would fail to produce the necessary revenue, and if a tariff were too high it would fail to produce the necessary revenue. No duty can be levied that would produce the necessary revenue. Seven hundred and fifty million dollars annually have been thought necessary for the ordinary expenses of this Government, leaving out the income of the Post Office Department.

The present tariff duties do not provide one-half of the revenues of this Government. But $314,000,000 was collected from duties on imports last year.

I do not believe that it would be possible to levy a tax even upon articles not produced in this country that would produce the necessary revenue.

The meaning of "tariff for revenue only" never had any reference to a duty on what was not produced in the United States. It expresses the difference between a tariff that was levied for the express purpose of protection with the incidental effect of producing revenue and a tariff levied for the purpose of revenue with the incidental and necessary effect of protection, and the time has come when no other tariff can be levied because a duty which would secure complete protection would produce no revenue, and a duty which would produce the revenue would not secure complete protection.

The total value of the dutiable merchandise imported last year was $750,000,000.

The value of the articles free of duty was $776,000,000.

Last year the amount collected by the receipts of duties on imports was $314,000,000, as I have said.

The internal-revenue receipts were $322,529,201, including the $34,000,000 collected by tax on the incomes of corporations.

If the entire dutiable imports of the United States were sold at their value, as stated by the Treasury Department, they would scarcely pay the expenses of the United States Government.

So it is manifest that a "tariff for revenue only" must be a tariff that the people will pay, and in the very nature of things such a duty would fail to produce the entire revenue.

The expenditures of the Government have grown beyond the possibility of securing even one-half of the amount by the duties on imports.

Recognizing this state of facts, and the further fact that the levying of these duties on imports has failed of its purpose and that it is in fact a granting by law of a privilege to certain classes of manufacturers, this House a few days ago passed an act levying a tax on incomes of individuals over and above $5,000 per annum. At the same time by another act the American people were relieved from a tax on sugar. This House cut off the privilege of levying tribute on the table of the American citizen and placed the burden on the American citizen who is enjoying an income of more than $5,000 per annum. This is in conformity with a former act by a former House imposing a tax upon corporations whose net annual earnings exceed $5,000. Thus, the former House—committed to protection—saw fit to supplement the inadequate revenue that might be secured by levying a tax on imports, by taxing the annual incomes of corporations in excess of $5,000.

Those gentlemen who are apprehensive that we can never relieve the American people of the burden of taxes on imported necessaries while we continue the same rate of expenditures, are simply mistaken. The people are slowly and certainly directing their attention to the problem of placing the burdens of this Government where they rightfully belong—upon the shoulders of those who are best able to bear them.

Every writer on political economy and every statesman whose name lives in history has advocated the principle of placing the burdens of Government upon those who have had the privilege of acquiring the greatest share of the Nation's wealth.

Wise men now see and understand distinctly that the vast revenues of this Government can not be derived from the earnings of the poor.

The late census reports show that the farms of the country are worth $41,000,000,000. This is less than one-third of the estimated value of the wealth of the American people.

Where did two-thirds of the wealth come from? No one has ever accurately calculated the wealth that has been derived from mines, forests, or fisheries, or the profits which we have realized in our dealings with other nations; and to furnish the pretended calculations of anyone who assumed to give these figures would be idle and useless, but there can be no doubt that more than one-third of all the wealth of this country represents the profit to others of the farmers' industry.

Now, is it not only fair that a part of the wealth which has been derived from the farmer should be sent back to the farmer?

The other nations of the earth have built good roads for military purposes. We improve our roads for the purpose of encouraging and aiding not only the greatest source of wealth and prosperity, but the very source of life itself. While all other enterprises have grown and prospered in the United States, the growing power of American farms, taken as a whole, has diminished in the last quarter of a century. In the fairest of all the regions of the United States farm population has diminished, either because active and able men have left the farms to try their fortunes in the cities or have emigrated, because of the high price of land, to the newer parts of the country, where they might secure cheaper land. Farmers who have amassed a competency have left their farms and removed to cities and towns, renting their farms to tenants, who removed the whole crop from the farm and slowly but surely diminished the growing power of the soil without fertilizing and renewing it.

Mr. Chairman, this is one of the most vital concerns of the American people. The burned city or the ruined factory can be rebuilt in a few months, but the wasted and impoverished farm, growing in weeds and shrubbery, as it is seen in many Eastern States, will require years to renew it and make it a source of living for the people.

It is the duty of this Government to address itself to this important matter, and I can not conceive of anything which will promote the interests of agriculture so certainly as the improvement of roads. There are places in the richest parts of the United States where it is impossible for a farmer to haul a load to market at certain times of the year. The question of improving roads is occupying the attention of the people. It was my privilege to serve as a county officer for five years before coming here in a county which built more roads in proportion to its area than any county in the West, and I never heard a word of regret, although they were expensive roads and cost $1 a linear foot to improve them.

I believe that it is the duty of Congress to stimulate road building. The people are wise and thoughtful. They know that the Government can not bear the whole expense nor any considerable part of the expense of improving roads, but they know the value of the aid and the recognition of the United States and the powerful impetus that it will give to road building.

The Bureau of Roads in the Agricultural Department publishes in its statistics that there are 2,199,388 miles of public roads in the United States. The report goes on to state that but $8\frac{66}{100}$ per cent of the mileage of these roads is improved.

In the State of Kansas there are 98,302 miles of public highways and but thirty-eight one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the distance covered by these roads is improved.

The average amount of money spent on each mile of road in the United States is $64.63, and in Kansas only $16.27 a mile is expended according to this report.

I can not agree with the gentlemen who say that we should protect the people against these appropriations.

Mr. Chairman, the people have never overtaxed themselves for anything which was useful to them, but the people of the United States have been overtaxed for things which were of absolutely no use to them.

The American farmer may get upon a high place and look as far as his vision will reach, and he can not see a spot where the Government of the United States has spent a single dollar outside of a city or town or away from some navigable river.

And yet since the foundation of this Government more than one-half a billion of dollars has been spent for the improvement of rivers and harbors to promote commerce by water, and the statistician has not lived and does not live able to furnish the figures stating how much this Government has given to railroads in the interests of railway transportation, while the latest act that I have been able to find for the building of wagon roads was one that showed an expenditure of $300,000 in June, 1834, for the improvement of the Cumberland Road.

No, Mr. Chairman, the people will not overtax themselves for public improvements. In fact, I think that the people of this Nation are as wise as we are, and I am certain that the events of the last few days have given us all a new appreciation of the dignity of the American people. When we see the spectacle of the two most distinguished men in the Nation going to the home of Daniel Webster and vindicating their respective reputations for truth and veracity against their mutual accusations of falsehood, the quiet and dignified patriotism of the American people rises mountain high in our estimation. Mr. Chairman, I say to you seriously that if the founders of this Government had allowed themselves to indulge in such unseemly and personal contests for place and power, we should never have had a flag or a country, and we should not to-day have a republican form of government. We would have the "man on horseback"; and if the people continue to testify their appreciation of these word battles for power, it will not be long before we demand something more exciting, and perhaps then the time will come when we shall witness a real battle for power such as is now in progress in Mexico.

No, Mr. Chairman, the rural population are steadfast. They are the most patriotic and dignified of all. They do not demand the depletion of the Treasury nor that any undue advantages should be given to them, but they do demand that Congress shall take interest in the question of the building of roads. The Constitution recites that "Congress shall have the power to establish post offices and post roads." The Constitution contemplates that road building is one of the functions of the Government, and inasmuch as Congress has power to build roads, it certainly has the power to take part in the improvement of roads.

A large number of bills of this character were introduced and referred to the Committee on Agriculture, of which I have the honor to be a member. Those bills presented a great variety of views and suggestions and plans. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], being the author of one of the bills and being interested in the subject, requested that we all unite in the authorship of such a bill as would be recommended by the committee and would recommend itself to the House. Each of us who had introduced a bill agreed with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] that he might prepare this measure. It was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and favorably reported. Then the Committee on Rules, at the request of a large number of Members of this House, reported a resolution suspending the rules of the House and allowing the bill to become a part of the postal appropriation bill. It is now before us as an amendment to that bill. This is not a bill to aid directly in the improvement of roads, but to pay for the use of roads traveled by rural carriers of mail. It divides roads into three classes and provides for compensation for their use as follows:

Class A shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide, composed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam, graded, crowned, compacted, and maintained in such manner that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface, and all other roads having a road track not less than 9 feet wide, of a construction equally smooth, firm, durable, and expensive, and continuously kept in proper repair.

Class B shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide, composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface.

Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted, and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times.

SEC. 2. That whenever the United States shall use any highway of any State or civil subdivision thereof which falls within classes A, B, or C, for the purpose of transporting rural mail, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile for highways of class A, $20 per annum per mile for highways of class B, and $15 per annum per mile for highways of class C. The United States shall not pay any compensation or toll for such use of such highways other than that provided for in this section, and shall pay no compensation whatever for the use of any highway not falling within classes A, B, or C.

These are the provisions of the bill as it was reported by the Committee on Agriculture. The reports of the Post Office Department show that about 1,000,000 miles of road are used for rural delivery. Inasmuch as a very small percentage of the roads used are embraced in classes A and B, while possibly 90 per cent are included in class C, the annual cost of this measure will probably be about $16,000,000. This would seem to be an immense sum, but it will not be spent for anything useless, but will be in furtherance and aid of the greatest of all our industries. It will furnish an inducement and an incentive to improve highways. It will not be abused. No sensible man would ask Congress to improve roads wholly at the expense of the United States Government. That would be impossible. This measure is not intended to furnish even a substantial part of the expense of macadamizing or otherwise improving roads, but it is intended to set on foot a system of road building that will result in the greatest interest being taken in this necessary improvement, and it is all done in behalf of agriculture—the most neglected and at the same time the greatest of all our sources of prosperity.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the committee to the fact that debate on all propositions of amendment relating to the pending proposition expires in 30 minutes.

Mr. TAGGART. I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call attention to the fact that extensions of the time of gentlemen having the floor mean the exclusion of some one else. The Chair will now put the request of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MANN. I give notice that I shall object to any extensions.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, at the risk of bringing down upon my head the condemnation of those who favor this amendment I shall oppose it, and though it remit me to private life I am willing to give expression, by my voice and by my vote, to my opposition to a plan which if inaugurated will lead to the control of every post route and country road in my State by the Federal Government. [Applause.] I have not in my mail a suggestion or a request from a single constituent of mine asking me to support this measure, and have not had since it has been under consideration. No doubt there are many in my district and State who are in favor of the improvement of the public roads of this country by the United States Government, but those people whom I have so long and I trust faithfully represented understand my position upon these questions, and when they vote for me in the primary or at the general election they know that during the 17 years of service I have given them here no vote of mine has ever been cast, or any suggestion made by me, that the ancient doctrine of the Democratic Party that the States owe some duty to themselves and the duty to control their local affairs and enforce their police laws belongs to the States and not to the General Government. [Applause.]

Sir, I wish I had the time to call attention to some of the objections I have to this proposed amendment. There are traveling through this country of ours to-day, and six days in every week, rural carriers on 1,000,015 miles of post roads in the various States, a distance that would carry them around the world 42 times each day. If we appropriate only $15 a mile, that means $18,000,000 a year at the least calculation, if we add not a single mile to our present rural routes. Where shall the money come from? It is not in the Treasury and must be provided for by taxation. From every section there comes the demand that taxes be decreased, and the burdens of taxation on what the people eat and wear and use be lessened. How are these burdens to be removed and appropriations to be increased at the same time? It is as impossible as the task of the man who undertook to lift himself over the fence by his boot straps. [Applause.]

But if we are to be guided purely by the benefits to be derived by our particular States or districts from this proposed amendment, then the advantages secured to my State and district are so insignificant that I decline to surrender my convictions of a lifetime in order to secure them.

Georgia has, according to the report from the Office of Public Roads, 82,230 miles of public roads; of this mileage 880 miles are gravel 4,326 sand clay, and 522 stone; in all, less than 7½ per cent of her public roads are so improved as to be embraced within the term of this amendment, and the other 75,000 miles would not receive anything. The district I represent has 3,288 miles of public roads now used as postal rural routes; of these not over 250 miles are improved or in condition to receive the smallest amount provided for by this amendment.

The Rural Mail Service has been a great boon to our people, and my people have not yet demanded of me that the General Government shall be charged rent or hire for the carrying of the mails to their homes and to their very doors. But it is said that the last Democratic platform demands our support of this amendment. I deny it; but if it did, I am thankful that the time is at hand, not more than 60 days distant, when we will no longer be bound by the platform made at Denver in 1908, upon which we were carried to political defeat and destruction. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that all debate upon the pending amendment is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is a pro forma one, and it will be considered as withdrawn if there be no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I offer the following amendment.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANDLER. There was a motion made to limit the debate to 30 minutes on the then pending amendment, as I understood it. I want to ask if that time has not been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion was that on the Shackleford amendment and all amendments thereto the debate be closed in 30 minutes. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 24, page 2, Shackleford amendment, insert as a new paragraph:

"Class D shall embrace all improved highways within city or county limits the cost and maintenance of which is paid for by the taxpayers resident therein, and the compensation therefor shall be equal to the highest rate paid by the United States for the use of any other highway of a county or State."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this amendment proposes to make uniform the legislation proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], and to make it uniform in compliance with our common understanding of the Constitution and the institutions of this country. Gentlemen rise upon this floor frequently and berate the manufacturer and the city dweller. They do so generally when a stampede comes from the farm or, as in this particular instance, from the free rural delivery carrier. But I question whether gentlemen on the other side have heard so much from their tax-paying constituencies with regard to this proposed good-roads subsidy amendment as would seem to be indicated from speeches made upon this floor. I have just returned from a two days' tour through the Central and New England States.

Everywhere I have asked men with whom I came in contact whether they knew that this Post Office appropriation bill contained the provisions it does relating to the condemnation of express companies, the construction of good roads at Federal expense, the establishment of a parcel post, the Government ownership of transportation facilities, and so forth, and in every instance I have been astounded at the information that this Congress was entering upon these radical propositions in this way.

You gentlemen may have heard from the rural carriers, but I question whether you have yet heard from the cities or those great masses of producers who, in one form or another, are required to maintain the Federal Treasury, and who are not aware that this Congress proposes now by this bill to enter upon the policy of the Government ownership of all public utilities.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not yield now. I have offered an amendment here which proposes that, whereas you create three classes of country roads in the several States that shall be given aid out of the Treasury of the United States, which Treasury is made up of the money of the common people of the United States, you shall go one step further and provide compensation to those builders of good roads who have already completed their work, who have paid their taxes, and who now are being called upon to pay a second time for the extension of roads in other sections of the country.

Oh, gentlemen talk about appropriations for rivers and harbors! Do the gentlemen who raise that question indicate where the money has gone that has been appropriated for the purpose of rivers and harbors since the beginning of this Government? I will briefly tell you—up to 1907 more than $550,000,000 had been appropriated by the Government, of which more than $210,000,000 went into the Mississippi Valley from the Lakes to the Gulf, and only $140,000,000 went to the great Atlantic seaboard for the improvements there that mean and have meant so much for the commerce and trade of the country. Do you want to know more about rivers and harbors appropriations? During the five years since 1907 you have appropriated $179,000,000, of which $110,000,000 have been poured into the Mississippi Valley for the purpose of holding up your shore lines and protecting your private property, while only $50,000,000 have gone along the Atlantic seaboard—where we raise 80 per cent of all of the tariff revenue of the country—and but $19,000,000 have gone to the Pacific coast where we are now endeavoring to improve our trade relations. You are not counting the cost——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that right, under the rule.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, the district which I represent contains not only large and important cities, but also an important farming community, and they are both equally interested in the construction and maintenance of good roads. The majority of the people of Pennsylvania are interested in the construction of good roads. In my judgment there is no other thing which will so advance civilization as that which promotes the interchange of intelligence and commodities between the different parts of a country and the different peoples who reside in that country. It is a difficult matter to excite sufficient interest to construct a road. It is still more difficult to secure the continued interest which will keep that road in repair. I consider this measure as most admirably framed to produce that result. The amount which is proposed to be given as rental for the use of the different classes of roads would not amount to the interest on the money that would be required to construct any one of the roads of the class named in the measure, but it will be an inducement to keep those roads in good repair. It has been stated that it would require $16,000,000 the first year in order to meet the provisions of this measure. If it did take $16,000,000, that would mean that there were about 800,000 miles of road kept in good condition throughout the United States. At present in this country there are less than 200,000 miles of improved roads, and if by an expenditure of $16,000,000 you could have 800,000 miles of road that were passable at all times of the year for vehicles of all classes, that were graded in conformity to the topography of the country and "with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface," it would reduce the expenses of transportation from the present high figures to what it now costs in France, namely, 7 cents per ton per mile. This measure would permit the farmer, the fruit or the truck raiser to get his produce to the market at a much less rate, and thereby it would be a benefit not only to him but to each person using his products in different parts of the country. It would permit the merchant in the city to carry or send anything he had of value to the farmer at a much less cost, and the result would be an economy to each individual as well as to the Government, as the mails that were transported over the roads would be carried at a much less actual cost, which would result in a diminution of the cost per mile to the Government from what it is now paying for this service.

Something has been said about the cost of inspection. Each man in charge of a rural delivery route would be a constant inspector of the road he covers, and the man who is sent out as a general inspector could, with a small expenditure of time in addition to that he now occupies, discover the condition of the roads. I consider the measure of great importance to this country, and will do as much, if not more, to advance civilization than any other measure that I have seen introduced in this Chamber. [Applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, just a word to say I am now, always have been, and always will be in favor of a free press in this country. At this time I desire to have read for the information of the House an article by Hon. Wilmer Atkinson, editor of the Farm Journal, for a free, untrammeled, and independent public press in the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

PROGRESS OF THE CONTEST FOR A FREE, UNTRAMMELED, AND INDEPENDENT PUBLIC PRESS IN THE UNITED STATES.

Over a decade ago, under the mistaken belief that the transportation of newspapers and periodicals through the mails caused great loss to the Government, officials of the Post Office Department started a campaign for a restricted circulation of the public press, and for this purpose demanded of Congress an increase of the postage rate, adopted a code of laws extraneous to the laws passed by Congress, and enforced them with the help of a small army of inspectors and a secret star-chamber court.

In the course of six years of revolutionary ferment and its aftermath, from December 7, 1905, to October 14, 1911, the Russian authorities confiscated issues of newspapers and periodicals in 1,055 cases. In 283 of these cases the issues confiscated were destroyed, and in 12 cases certain pages of articles were removed by order of the court. These figures refer only to confiscations which were subsequently approved by the courts.

In the United States of America during the same period, 1905 to 1911, inclusive, 5,236 publications were either denied access to or ejected from the mails, resulting in a permanent suspension of issues, in many cases with little less disastrous results to the owners than would have been the confiscation of types, presses, and other printing and publishing equipments.

In Russia the confiscation of 1,055 publications applied only to certain specific issues or parts of issues, not to the publications themselves, in every case authority for the procedure being justified by regularly constituted courts.

In the United States the confiscation covered the whole establishments, to the ability and right to publish further issues, without appeal to the courts, and based, not upon any well-defined or well-understood laws of Congress, but upon certain multitudinous, obscure, arbitrary rules and regulations, varying according to the notions of the official who happened to occupy the seat of power, and changing from year to year.

The excuse for such mild exhibition of Russian despotism was the publication of articles inimical to the Government; the sole pretext in the United States for such drastic and arbitrary action was the authority given to the Postmaster General by Congress for the classification of mail matter. The justification in the minds of postal officials was that the Government lost money on second-class matter, a condition that did not exist.

It has seemed to be my duty, as it has been my pleasure, to oppose this policy of the Post Office Department, and to endeavor, in as gentle and considerate a way as possible, to bring the Government back to a realization of the lawlessness and wrongfulness of thus imposing burdens upon the public press and of subjecting it to animadversion and oppression the like of which is unknown, and probably would not be tolerated, in any other civilized country.

While my ultimate and chief concern has been for the independence and freedom of the press, I early foresaw that the wisest course to pursue was to prove from the official records of the Post Office Department that the Government loses nothing on second-class matter; but, on the other hand, that such matter, by reason of the enormous amount of other classes of mail matter originated by it, fairly estimated to be 75 per cent of the whole, is in reality more profitable than any other. Anyone who will read with open mind and a desire to learn the truth the official facts that I have printed and published in recent issues of this sheet and in pamphlet form can but conclude that my purpose has been accomplished; so that it is now well understood and generally admitted, outside of official quarters, at least, that any further persecution of publishers and confiscation of their rights, liberties, and ability to publish on the part of the Government has no basis of propriety or justice. An encouraging outlook is therefore presented in the success of the first step toward the triumph of our good cause.

The chief difficulty in the way of a proper adjustment of the relations of the Government to the press has been the attitude of publishers themselves, evidence of which is contained in the report of the Overstreet Commission, as follows: "At the hearing in New York in October, 1906, the representatives of the periodicals were able to agree upon but few recommendations, each class of periodicals being willing to make a sacrifice only of the particular privilege which it did not make use of. The representatives of the metropolitan daily press, for instance, were quite willing that the distinction in favor of weekly newspapers, including the free county privilege, should be abolished; that sample copies should be altogether prohibited; that extension of credit to subscribers should be stopped, and that all premiums or clubbing schemes resulting in abnormal discounts in the price of subscription should be done away with. The interior dailies and weekly papers, on the other hand, protested against the prohibition of credit to subscribers, except after the expiration of a year and a half. The interior dailies were willing to see the sample-copy privilege largely reduced, and it was argued that an absolute prohibition of samples would hamper the starting of new publications to the advantage of those already established."

It was to me obvious that, with this situation existing, publishers were at a disadvantage in allowing postal officials to carry forward any policy they chose, regardless of the protests and of the welfare of publishers, working their way with one class at a time, and it has been my endeavor, my argument, and persuasion, in season and out of season for several years to rectify this unfortunate condition and bring publishers in harmony with each other, in order that they might unitedly combat measures designed and calculated to cripple their business enterprises and destroy their independence.

Proof is not wanting, outside of the findings of the Overstreet Postal Commission that publishers were not standing together as they should and as they must if they are ever to win. Nearly all of the great metropolitan daily newspapers were ever ready to side with the postal authorities in advocating an increase of rates (for others) and for a more drastic regulation against the freedom of circulation of other classes of publications; and the country weeklies, which in part paid no postage, were indifferent to the cry of distress raised by weeklies and monthlies outside of their territory. Now, a change has come, there is a more friendly feeling between various classes of publishers, and an almost united front is presented against the policy of Government repression and persecution.

As proof I submit the report of the postal committee of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, an organization representing nearly all the metropolitan dailies, as follows:

"There were delivered by express and railroad shipments last year 324,220,818 pounds of newspapers at a rate varying from one-fourth to 1 cent a pound, the bulk going at a rate of one-fourth to one-half cent a pound. This goes to show the absurdity of the proposed legislation doubling the postage rate and limiting the privilege to publications that carry as much reading matter as they do advertising. The proposal was stupid enough when the postal deficit was $17,000,000 two years ago; it becomes preposterous in the face of a surplus. What business has a transportation corporation, which is all the Post Office is, to prescribe how a business shall be conducted? It can not be assumed that such legislation will ever get by Congress. But publishers are requested to fight the theory that the right to send their output by mail is a 'privilege.' The figures show it is not. The Post Office is a badly managed business. That is all. We should fight its dictation, its censorship, and its inefficiency."

These sentiments, issued by authority of the most powerful association of publishers in the United States, are now current in nearly all daily newspaper offices throughout the country, which certainly indicates marked progress toward better conditions. The following illustrates the changed attitude of the rural press:

"The newspaper men of South Dakota, in convention assembled, recently determined that, regardless of party affiliation, they will secure justice from the Post Office Department or know the reason why. The publishers of Minnesota are much alive on the same subject. The National Press Association is a virile organization, which will make itself felt in national and State affairs. We don't want any shakedown proposition. We are not looking for any special legislation in our favor. We are simply opposed to legislation passed against us. And we are certainly unanimously opposed to the oligarchical rule of the bureaucrats at Washington." (Publisher of a Montana weekly.)

Contrast the situation existing at the time the Overstreet Postal Commission met in 1906, when the Government's ultimatum was a 4-cent-a-pound confiscatory rate, when publishers were pulling at sixes and sevens, and now, when only a 2-cent rate is demanded, and the whole press of the country is fairly well united in demanding a square deal from the Government, a retention of the present rate and a new and fair adjustment of the relations between the Post Office Department and the press.

With a foresight and wisdom for which he was not given adequate credit, Edwin C. Madden, in his annual report for 1905, declared "that there ought to be a law enacted that will establish second-class matter upon simpler and less ideal distinctions. The present statute requires altogether too much interpretation, too much regulation, and the exercise of too much executive discretion. The rate of postage should not depend upon such complicated questions as to require experts to determine what comes within and what does not come within the law. A new law is needed, the present act is woefully out of date. Regardless of whether the rate be raised, or lowered, or remain as it is, there should be, as a matter of justice and reason and business sanity, a change in the conditions, considerations, and qualifications for the classification of second-class matter."

While felicitating ourselves upon the excellent progress made, we, however, must not conclude that the contest is ended, that little more remains to be done. I want to see the public press entirely free from the control of Government; I want to witness a complete abandonment of the claim of the Post Office Department of the right, under the pretext of classifying mail matter or under any other pretext, to say who shall and who shall not print and publish anywhere in the United States.

WILMER ATKINSON.

PHILADELPHIA, April, 1912.

Mr. GUDGER was recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that all debate on the pending amendment has been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that all debate on the pending amendment is exhausted. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. GUDGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his point of order for a minute. I shall vote for this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is exhausted. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

[Mr. CANDLER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 22, of H. R. 22952, after the word "act," insert the following: "Under and in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed jointly by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General."

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. There can be no debate on the amendment; all debate is exhausted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to adopt this amendment which the gentleman offers. We who are the friends of the bill are all favorable to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after line 13, on page 3 of the Shackleford amendment, the following:

"Provided, That no compensation shall be paid by the Government for roads now falling within classes A, B, or C, except as follows: The compensation above mentioned shall be paid on all class C roads which shall hereafter be improved so as to fall in class A or B, said compensation to be due from the time said road falls within class A or B as fixed above for said class A or B; on all class B roads hereafter improved so as to fall within class A, the compensation provided for above shall be paid from the time said road falls within class A at the rate fixed for a class A road; all roads not now falling within any of said classes shall whenever they are so improved as to fall within class A, B, or C be entitled to the compensation provided for above from the time said road falls within either of said classes at the rate fixed for said class."

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may have five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I ask that the gentleman may speak for two minutes and somebody speak for two minutes in opposition.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri object?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I do.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GUDGER. Mr. Chairman, after many years of fruitless agitation in and out of Congress on the subject of national aid in the building of good public highways we have come at last to the point of action, and my assertion in this House a few weeks ago that a majority of its Members favor such legislation is to be verified in the vote on this amendment. Moreover, a record vote will show the "people" who are their real friends on this question, and it will also give proof that those who in season and out of season have contended for this forward step in public policy have not and can not be driven from their position by being called "dirt-road statesmen" or any like epithets.

We are making a logical beginning by providing for this national aid in a Post Office appropriation bill, for in the constitutional power to establish post roads is necessarily included not only the authority, but by implication the mandate, to construct such roads. In the proposed legislation lies the expressed recognition—I might say the first recognition—of the right of our agricultural population to this aid from the National Treasury.

It is in no spirit of caviling that I say that the Government, with well-nigh unmeasured liberality, has poured out hundreds, nay, thousands of millions of dollars that have benefited directly or indirectly every class of people except the farmer. Since the foundation of the Government we have given hundreds of millions for the erection of public buildings in cities large and small. We have given nearly three-quarters of a billion dollars for the improvement of our rivers and harbors, and I am heartily in favor of a continuance of such appropriations. We shall have spent $400,000,000 on the Panama Canal by the time that great waterway joining the two great oceans is completed, and shall be called upon to spend annually large sums of money for its maintenance. It is the greatest public work of all the ages, undertaken by the greatest Republic of all time. It is an enterprise worthy and typical of a great people.

In the 136 years of our national life the Government has spent a pitiful $14,000,000 on the building and improvement of public highways, and not a cent of this money, be it remembered, has been appropriated or spent within the last 55 or 60 years. So we see that practically nothing has been done by the National Government to lighten the burden which execrable roads have laid upon the farmer. The Secretary of Agriculture has stated in his official reports that it costs the farmers of the United States not less than $600,000,000 a year to haul their product to market. He has also said that if we had in this country public roads as good as those of France it would save our farmers two-thirds of that enormous sum. Just think of it! They lose by bad roads in one year as much as the total cost of the Panama Canal.

The farmers have been patient and long suffering. They have a right to demand that something be done in which they have a direct pecuniary interest. In their modest way they and their spokesmen have made their pleas for a beginning at least of that national improvement which this amendment will set on foot. There is no element of our population more patriotic or self-sacrificing. From the day when "the embattled farmers" fought the great fight for independence down to this day they have stood on every battle field of the Republic and given added luster to the fame of American heroism. They have never hesitated to pledge their lives, their liberties, and their sacred honor to the cause of their country, and have never failed to redeem that pledge. They have always given much, and have always received but little.

Let me say right here that the individual States have not been derelict in this matter of public-road building. The Office of Public Roads of the Department of Agriculture recently issued a tabulated statement showing the amounts which each State had appropriated in 1911 for this purpose, and the sum total of these appropriations was nearly $160,000,000. Of the taxes required to pay this sum, principal and interest—for a great part is represented by bond issues—the larger part will have to come from the farmers. But the States can not and should not carry on the tremendous work of building good roads throughout the length and breadth of the land without national aid. There are about 2,200,000 miles of public roads in the United States of which only 8 or 9 per cent are improved. This leaves 2,000,000 miles to be put in condition, approximately, at least, as good as that of the best roads of France. Good macadamized or sand clay roads cost from $2,000 to $4,000 a mile.

The undertaking before us is one of a magnitude proportionate to its importance. It can not be accomplished in its entirety in less than half a century, perhaps even more than that. But a beginning can be made, and if the work is carried on systematically year after year with such assistance from the Government as the circumstances of the situation fully warrant it will not be long before in each State the farmers will be cheered by the prospect of better roads, and so from year to year some of the burden will be lifted from off their shoulders.

Neither the States nor the National Government will be the loser by generous expenditure for public-road construction, for the money will come back in time through the increase in the taxable value of farm lands. This is not a speculative statement, but is based on the experience of landowners in whose vicinity road improvement has been carried on. The price of farm land in those favored precincts is reliably stated to have risen 25 per cent an acre as soon as good roads were begun to be built. Just think how it will thrill the farmer's heart when he finds not only the value of his land increased by one-fourth, but also finds the cost of marketing his produce reduced by one-half to two-thirds. These are not day dreams, Mr. Chairman, they are "frozen facts."

It is nearly 10 years since the National Good Roads Association presented to the Senate Committee on Agriculture a brief which contains so many truths applicable to this day that I shall quote from it just a few paragraphs:

> It has been asserted by those who ought to know that 90 per cent of the revenues of the Government of the United States is spent in the great cities on public buildings, the construction of battleships, in furnishing munitions of war, and for the improvement of rivers and harbors, but less than 10 per cent is spent in the country, although these people have furnished more than half the revenues of the Government. It is not right; it is not just.
> Whatever makes for the agricultural prosperity and development of the country also aids other industries in the land. All classes rely upon good crops for prosperity. The banker, the manufacturer, the ironmaster the lumberman, and even the professions feel the influence of good crops and the depressing effects of bad ones. * * *
> The economic benefits to be derived from systematic and scientific road construction is the saving of a large sum of money now spent on improper methods of repair and construction, together with much that would be saved in transportation by carriages, wagons, etc. Great as these benefits would be—and they are the ones which first appeal to the minds of most persons—there are other benefits to be derived from good roads throughout the country which can not be estimated in dollars and cents, but which are of infinitely greater importance and value. It is a perplexing problem now as to how to provide for the ever-increasing numbers in the already densely thronged cities. And this condition is becoming more and more a menace to our social institutions. Unquestionably the remedy is to make the country more attractive to keep the people on the farm.

This, Mr. Chairman, brings us to another most important phase of the question of good roads—the social phase. We have been hearing much of late of the ever-increasing migration from the country to the city. It has reached such proportions that whereas a quarter of a century ago the proportion of the rural population to that of the cities was about 60 per cent, it is now only 46 per cent. This is an abnormal falling off, but its beginning dates back for more than 25 years, and when we look for the cause we shall not be long in doubt as to the remedy. It is the isolation due to poor roads.

This is a serious matter, Mr. Chairman, not for the farmer alone, but for all the people. The cost of living is immediately and intimately connected with it. If the depletion of the farming population continues and the population of the cities increases proportionately, it means that prices of everyday necessities will continue to rise, because the producing class grows smaller and the consuming class grows larger. If there were no other than this economic reason, it would be a powerful argument in favor of a movement tending to improve the conditions of farm life and thereby check the exodus from the farm and the resulting decrease in farm production. But there are many other reasons for favoring this movement—national aid in the building of public roads—and chief among them is simple justice to the farmer. Just as the Government makes life in the cities more agreeable by building fine edifices for the accommodation of the dwellers there, it ought to do its share in the work of relieving rural isolation.

In no manner can this be done more effectively than by the building of good roads.

The basic principle is compensation to be paid by the Federal Government for the use of the roads traversed by carriers in the Rural Delivery Service on roads to be divided into three classes:

1. Class A: The highest form of improved road in the country, for which it is provided that the Government shall pay at the rate of $25 per mile per year.

2. Class B: A thoroughfare of high quality, but not equaling class A, for which it is provided that the Government shall pay at the rate of $20 per mile per year.

3. Class C: The ordinary dirt road of the country, somewhat improved, for which it is provided that the Government shall pay at the rate of $15 per mile per year.

It will be necessary in order to participate in the provision of this bill to have a standard road coming under one of the three foregoing classes. The beneficial effect of this measure will be observed in the immediate improvement of public highways.

The amendment looking to aid from the Government is not all I would wish for. It is a modest beginning, but it is a step forward. It will not take over $25,000,000 annually from the Treasury. Its effect, however, will be manifold. It will stimulate the demand of the rural population for good roads and cause it to regard the financial burden thereby imposed as one to be welcomed because of the immediate, direct, and personal benefits. Intercommunication will be promoted; mails will come more frequently; haulage to the railroad station or nearest market town will not be at so heavy a cost on teams and rolling stock, and the marketing of crops can be carried on continuously instead of depending, as now it must, on the state of the weather and the consequent condition of the mud roads; the freight charges on goods delivered to the farmer will be lessened, and thus in many ways long-wished-for advantages will accrue.

The procedure proposed in this amendment is rational because the expenditure provided for will be directed to roads that are now not hopelessly unimproved, and again others so infrequently used that their improvement can be indefinitely postponed. It will call for the best thought of State and county authorities as to where improvement should begin and how it is to be conducted. There will be conferences and consultations with the Office of Public Roads, and systematic plans will be matured which are absolutely impossible under happy-go-lucky methods such as now too often prevail. It will be possible for us to look forward to the coming of the day when it shall no longer be said that we of the United States, while we have the most superb railways we also have the most execrable country roads.

Twenty-five million dollars a year for such a work is little enough when we consider what we shall accomplish with it. It is but one-sixteenth part of what the Panama Canal will cost, but with all the wonderful things that are expected from this monumental enterprise, I doubt if they will measure up, either in dollars and cents, or in national importance, to the wealth annually to be saved by improved roads and to the social and economic betterment that will spring from perfect highways.

In the debate on this amendment the old, old question of the constitutionality of national aid for public improvements construction has again been raised. I shall not enroll myself among the debaters except to say that it was thrashed out by the greatest minds this country has produced, and has been settled in the affirmative by the Supreme Court of the United States. My conscience as a maker of laws will be quite at ease on this point. I shall record my vote as often as need be in favor of this amendment, and of any other proposition hereafter that looks to "going it one better." And I shall scan with pardonable curiosity the final roll call to see how many of my colleagues representing rural communities were joined with me in this good fight, how many of our city brethren were willing to help our cause, and then who were they that failed to "come up to the scratch."

The year 1912 will be a notable one in the annals of our national life, but in no respect will it be more notable than that in it there was inaugurated—or shall I say revived—the policy of national aid in the building of public roads. The historian will be able to point to 1912 as the year in which the first important step was taken toward the establishment of a system of public highways such as our people long have hoped for. It will mark the beginning of a new social state for the farmer and his family. It will mean a lifting of burdens and changed conditions in many ways.

Speed the good work, all of you who have at heart the well-being of the "common people." A great light is shining and casting its rays far into the future to make bright the paths of generations yet unborn. My brethren, if you and I have nothing else on which to rest our fame as legislators for the public weal, we can safely point to speech and vote for good roads as the foundation stone of our work for those that sent us here. And I, for one, feel confident that they in turn will not fail to hold up our hands and commend us for our labors.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri as amended.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 122, noes 39.

[Applause.]

So the amendment as amended was adopted.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, if there is any excuse for this class of legislation, it is that it will increase the good-roads mileage of the country. If that is the purpose of this legislation, then the amendment I have offered should be adopted. The so-called Shackleford amendment, which I seek to modify, provides for the immediate payment out of the Treasury of the United States, according to the report of the committee, of the sum of $2,535,000 per year.

There are in the country 118,000 miles of roads over which rural routes pass which will be entitled at once to the payments provided in this measure. The Shackleford amendment, which we are considering, creates a great and expensive machine reaching out into three of the departments of this Government for the purpose of taking from the Treasury $2,535,000 per year, this amount to be distributed each year, not for the purpose of increasing the mileage of the good roads of the country but for the purpose of making donations to those road districts of the country where land is valuable and where good roads have already been built.

Class A roads in this measure are the brick, shell, and macadam roads of the country properly graded and crowned. Class B roads are the burnt clay or gravel or sand and clay roads of the country properly constructed and properly drained. Class C roads are the properly constructed and crowned dirt roads of the county. At present there is a total of 118,000 miles of improved roads coming within these classes over which pass rural routes. These roads were improved because the people who lived in the neighborhoods where the roads were located wanted them improved. They were not improved for the purpose of obtaining donations from the Treasury of the United States. The two and one-half millions per year we propose now to donate to them operates as a reward to those particular communities for the progressive spirit they have displayed. If we are to reward out of the Treasury communities on account of having displayed a spirit of progress, there will not be much money left in the Treasury at the end of a few months of a policy of this kind.

The amendment I have offered excludes from the operation of this law all roads now improved and in these classes and used for rural routes. Whenever a class B road is improved so that it becomes a class A road, then from that moment my amendment applies. Whenever a class C road is improved so as to become a class A or a class B road the amendment I have offered then extends the proposed aid to the road districts where such road is located. Whenever a road used as a rural route and not belonging to any of these classes is improved so that it comes within one of them, by my amendment, from the time this road enters class A, B, or C, the road districts through which it passes are entitled to the proposed bonus from the Treasury.

It is objected that this is unfair for the reason that it taxes communities which have already built good roads and takes the money so raised and gives it to communities which have not yet built roads that are entitled to the classification set out in this bill.

But in reply to that I might call attention to the fact that only a portion of the total road mileage of the country is used by the rural routes, and a very large portion of the total road mileage of the country never will be traversed by rural routes. If the Shackleford amendment becomes a law, we tax those sections which have no improved roads at all, and we take the money we so get from them and pay it to those communities which have now or shall hereafter have good roads traversed by rural routes, and we tax those sections which do not now have rural routes and which never will have rural routes and give the money so raised to those sections which are so fortunate as to enjoy rural mail service. There is absolutely no equitable way in which money can be distributed from the Treasury of the United States so that all will be equally benefited. If the Government goes into the good-roads business, it ought to go into it on the theory that roads are to be improved, not for the purpose alone of benefiting the landowners who live along the rural routes, but for the purpose principally of furnishing cheaper transportation from the farms to the railroad stations, and therefore from the farms to the great centers of population. Transportation as an economical factor is quite as important as production.

We are distributing at the present time from the Treasury nearly $2,000,000 for the relief of flood sufferers along the Mississippi River and its tributaries and for the purpose of repairing breaks in levees. Sections along the rivers where there are levees which did not break in the last few weeks get none of this fund. They do not get it because they do not need it. According to the theory of the Shackleford amendment the Government ought to take the $2,000,000 now being distributed for the purpose of relieving the conditions caused by the recent floods and divide it into equal portions and distribute it along the entire mileage of the rivers, among all the levee districts, whether the levees protecting the districts broke or not.

We are being asked to appropriate many millions of dollars for the purpose of providing a deep-water harbor for Philadelphia, as deep as the harbor of New York. Some day this work will be undertaken by the Government. Under the theory of the Shackleford amendment, if we expend these millions of dollars for the purpose of deepening the harbor of Philadelphia we should also give to the other cities along the coast the same amount of money, whether their harbors need deepening or not.

The Shackleford amendment proposes to pay out money for the purpose of inducing communities to do that which their prosperous condition has already enabled them to do, and the two and one-half millions per year with which we start these appropriations, if the Shackleford amendment is adopted, absolutely continues for all time as an annual reward to those communities which have already built good roads on account of having in the past built them. Such a raid on the Treasury as this can not be defended upon any theory that occurs to me. If we are to have legislation of this character we ought to have it for the purpose of increasing the good-roads mileage of the country, not for the purpose of rewarding communities which have already built good roads or for the purpose of reimbursing them from the Public Treasury on account of money they have already expended. Millions ought not to be taken from the Treasury for the purpose of accomplishing that which has already been done. Money ought not to be taken from the Treasury for the purpose of extending aid where aid is not needed.

The number of miles of State roads now traveled by rural and star route carriers is said to be about 1,179,000. It is estimated that the mileage in class A will ultimately be 35,000; in class B, 83,000 miles; and in class C, 1,061,000. It is claimed that whenever all the roads now traveled by rural and star route carriers are improved so that they come within the above three classes the amount per year a bill will carry under the Shackleford amendment will be $18,450,000. However, only a small proportion of this aggregate mileage is in condition to receive immediate compensation, only about 118,000 miles, but I respectfully submit that this 118,000 miles ought not to be entitled to any payments under this bill. I do not think anything like the total mileage now traveled by rural and star route carriers will ever be improved so as to come within these classes, but as the years pass there will be a demand for modifications of this classification, which will probably be agreed to, so that roads which can not now be classed in any of these classes will get the benefit of donations from the Treasury, and ultimately a scheme for Federal aid will be carried to roads not traversed by rural routes.

If the roads of the country improve there is no limit to the amount that may a few years from now be taken out of the Treasury on this account, especially if the spirit of the Shackleford amendment is to prevail. If roads that are now improved and come within the classifications fixed in this measure are to receive donations from the Treasury it will not be long until this generous tendency to equalize things will lead to the adoption of other classes and appropriations from the Treasury for the roads embraced in the new classes so created. If we are to enter upon this dangerous career it is better, I submit, to enter upon it simply for the purpose of adding to the mileage of the good roads of the country. If my amendment prevails we can, I think, with greater safety embark upon this policy if we propose to adopt the policy of Federal aid for roads.

I am an advocate of good roads. I believe in the policy. In my judgment, good roads, by cheapening transportation to railroad stations and to navigable rivers, will decrease the cost to the consumer in the distant city of the products of the farm. I yield to no man in my advocacy of good roads. I do not, however, regard the Shackleford amendment as a desirable good-roads measure.

I am not just at present advised as to the cost of a class A road. It would probably not be under $8,000 or $10,000 per mile. A rural route 20 miles long, to come under class A, would therefore cost from $160,000 to $200,000. Does anybody believe that the road districts through which a 20-mile rural route passes—and it may pass through several road districts—can unite upon a policy for creating for 20 miles through these districts a class A road in order to get from the Treasury of the United States the paltry sum of $25 per mile. Or, if the Sherwood amendment can be so construed as to apply to each separate mile traversed by a rural route, does anybody believe that any road district can be persuaded, in order to get $25 per year from the National Treasury, to expend from $8,000 to $10,000 per mile in building a mile of class A road? Class B roads would cost almost as much.

I do not know what a class C road would cost, but it would probably cost $2,000 or $3,000 per mile on an average. Does anybody believe that in order to get $15 a mile per year a road district would expend $2,000 or $3,000 per mile for a road?

In my judgment, as an inducement to build good roads this measure fails. Almost as many good roads will be built without it. As a method, however, of reimbursing to the amounts per mile mentioned in the Shackleford amendment those road districts in the country which have already built roads which can be classified under the Shackleford amendment, it is a measure that will meet, in all probability, with the approval of those particular districts and will have the undoubted effect, while it can not aid in inducing these districts to do what they have already done, of taking from the Treasury the sum of two and a half million dollars per year. As a method of draining the Treasury it would be a success. As a method of adding to the good-roads mileage of the country it will not, in my judgment, have much effect.

If my amendment is adopted, the good-roads proposition we are considering will cost the country nothing at all to start with, and as roads are constructed or improved hereafter so as to bring them within the provisions of the bill the payments will commence; and I think the adoption of this amendment will have the effect of preventing in the future a further and more liberal classification which will permit money to be taken from the National Treasury for the purpose of aiding road districts which have built roads not as good as those contemplated now in the proposition we are considering.

Money gets into the Treasury of the United States only as a result of taxing the people indirectly. Indirect taxation is the most expensive and the most burdensome of all. It means that the people are taxed five or six dollars every time one dollar is by these methods covered into the Treasury. I therefore am opposed to the spirit of the Shackleford amendment, which provides, in its last analysis, merely an avenue through which money may be taken from the Treasury for the purpose of rewarding and reimbursing communities which have already done that which its proponents claim this bill is framed for the purpose of inducing them to do.

The amendment which I propose reads as follows:

Insert, after line 13, on page 3 of the Shackleford amendment, the following:

"Provided, That no compensation shall be paid by the Government for roads now falling within classes A, B, or C, except as follows: The compensation above mentioned shall be paid on all class C roads which shall hereafter be improved so as to fall in class A or B, said compensation to be due from the time said road falls within class A or B as fixed above for said class A or B; on all class B roads hereafter improved so as to fall within class A, the compensation provided for above shall be paid from the time said road falls within class A at the rate fixed for a class A road; all roads not now falling within any of said classes shall whenever they are so improved as to fall within class A, B, or C be entitled to the compensation provided for above from the time said road falls within either of said classes at the rate fixed for said class."

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 15, page 28 of H. R. 21279, insert the following:

"That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons, or association or corporation, to enter or to have entered into the mails of the United States any newspaper, magazine, or other periodical of like kind, unless such publication shall have plainly printed in a conspicuous place therein the name or names of the managing editor or managing editors, the name or names of the publisher or publishers, and the name or names of the owner or owners, including all stockholders owning stock of the par value of $500 or more of such periodical publication. Any person, association, or corporation that shall violate any provision of this act shall be punished for each violation of any provision thereof by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000."

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARNHART. Would it be in order for me, under the rule authorizing the consideration of this amendment, to offer a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. BARNHART. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the following substitute be considered instead of the amendment just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to consider the substitute in place of the amendment provided for in the rule. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

As an amendment to the amendment, after line 15, page 28 of H. R. 21279, insert the following:

"That it shall be unlawful for any person, association, or corporation to enter or deposit, or to have entered or deposited, into the mails of the United States any newspaper, magazine, or other periodical publication of like kind published in the United States, unless such publication shall have plainly printed in a conspicuous place therein the name or names of the managing editor or managing editors, the name or names of the publisher or publishers, and the name or names of the owner or owners, including the name or names of the owner or owners of stock, bonds, or other securities, to the amount of $500 or more, which have been issued or sold by the said person, association, or corporation owning or controlling such publication and which may be outstanding. Also all editorial or other reading matter published in any such circulating periodical for the insertion of which money or other consideration is accepted by the publisher or publishers shall be plainly marked "advertisement" or signed by the name or names of the person or persons in whose interest or interests such article is published. Any person, association, or corporation that shall so enter or deposit, or have entered or deposited in the mails of the United States any such newspaper, magazine, or periodical publication of like kind in violation of the foregoing provisions shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be fined in any sum not less than $100 nor more than $1,000 for each offense."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, this substitute to the amendment contains three distinct propositions. The first is that before any newspaper, magazine, or other periodical publication published in the United States shall be admitted to the United States mails it must contain the name or the names of the editor, the owners, stockholders, and other security holders printed on a conspicuous page of each issue thereof. The second proposition——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BARNHART. I can not yield just now. I want to explain my amendment.

The second proposition is that no periodical publication of like kind shall accept for pay any editorial or reading-matter notice in behalf of any person or proposition unless the same contains plainly printed or attached thereto the word "advertisement" or the name or names of the person or persons in whose interest or interests such publication is made. The third distinct proposition is that any periodical editor or owner who violates any of the provisions of this act shall be fined in a sum of not less than $100 or more than $1,000 for each and every offense. Such, in brief, is the substance of the amendment.

And now just a word in behalf thereof. All over this country, during recent years at least, there has been a growing suspicion in the minds of the reading newspaper public that at least certain publications are being controlled by evil influences and are being so controlled by subterfuge. That is to say, that interests that wish to promulgate their ideas or "boost" their own interests secure control of some newspaper or magazine publication and issue it anonymously. Only to-day I hear that one of the new States recently admitted to the Union in its legislature is making provision that no newspaper published therein can accept any legal advertising until the names of the editors and owners of the publication are known. Every day we see suspicious circumstances and we hear rumors. I do not know that they are true, but I do know this, that these rumors that certain newspapers are controlled by certain corporate and other interests are unfair to the honest and legitimate newspaper men of the United States.

I also say that the people of the country have a suspicion that they are being imposed upon by men in the newspaper profession who are sailing under false colors, and they have a right to know the source of the editorial sentiment that is given to them. And another thing, on behalf of the newspaper-publishing fraternity of the United States, I appeal to you, sirs, that every honest editor and every deserving newspaper, or periodical, rather, in this country will approve a method which will compel the editorial endeavors of the country to stand out in the broad sunlight of day in order that everybody may see who they are and what they are. The reading public of the United States is entitled to know who is who before it decides what is what.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. I will.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the gentleman to a proposition which he said he had covered in his substitute, but I think has not quite covered it. Under the amendment of the gentleman anyone who deposits any paper in the mails, although they put it in a wrapper with full postage upon it, would be liable to a penalty of $100 unless that paper contained the information required in the amendment. Take, for instance, the Sunday magazine that comes with a large number of the papers now. Under the gentleman's amendment if anybody should wrap one of those magazines up and deposit it in the mails they would be subject to a penalty of $100, because those magazines do not and are not required to contain the information which would be contained in some other part of the paper. Would not the gentleman accomplish all he wants to accomplish if he should provide that his amendment would only relate to matter deposited as second-class mail matter?

Mr. BARNHART. I just called up within the last half hour the Post Office Department and they made the suggestion that, in order to avoid complications with foreign publications that might come in, the words "United States publication" should be inserted.

Mr. MANN. That covers the question of the foreign papers, to which I called the attention of the gentleman on the floor awhile ago, but that would not cover the matter of mailing a part of the newspaper or a Sunday magazine.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman let me explain? I think I can make that matter clear to him in a few words, as every newspaper man on this floor will bear me out. It has been the custom for a good many years to take advantage of the reading public by the very process that the gentleman now suggests, and that is to say, that to certain small newspapers throughout the United States certain publishers will say, "We will furnish a beautiful colored supplement free of charge," and it will be an attractive feature and will run along for a month, say.

Eventually the very interests that are back of that supplement will develop and the reading matter therein is objectionable; but inasmuch as your contracts have been made, you must circulate it the year out for which you have contracted, and thereby you are giving out to your readers editorial sentiment of a kind that no honest and careful and fair-minded editor wants to put out.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not get the point that I am making. He has directed his penalty against an individual wrapping up a newspaper or a part of a newspaper and putting it in the mail.

Mr. BARNHART. Just one minute. If the name of the publication is printed on that Sunday magazine—for instance, supposing it should be the Chicago Tribune—they would make up a supplement of the Chicago Tribune and mark it "The Chicago Tribune supplement" or "magazine," the same as the Post Office Department requires all papers mailed to be marked, and it could go through the mail without question under this amendment.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it could go through the mails when it comes from the Tribune office with the rest of the paper, but suppose I myself should mail it—suppose I should mail that supplement merely. Does the gentleman want to subject me to a fine of $100 for sending this Sunday magazine through the mails to somebody who does not have reading matter in his home? That Sunday magazine does not contain the information required under this amendment, and still the gentleman puts in a penal provision against anyone mailing anything that does not contain the information prescribed. The information would be given in some other part or section of the Tribune which I did not mail. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not cover the whole question when he covers the use of the second-class privilege?

Mr. COX of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Then the gentleman's objection would hold against this sort of a situation: Suppose that a statement with reference to the persons who owned the stock was printed in the Chicago Tribune, and suppose that was published on the editorial page, where it would probably be published. Then, according to the gentleman's theory, if some distinguished gentleman of this House, say the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], had made a great speech, and it was carried on the second page of the Chicago Tribune, no one could send that page through the mails?

Mr. MANN. Not without being penalized.

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, it would not be subject to such a construction, because the fact is distinctly set out that it is a part of that publication, because the name of the publication is carried on every page. The requirement of the amendment is that this should be printed on only one page. The man who gets that part of the paper suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox], if he were interested to know who the owners or publishers are, could go out and buy a copy of the paper of that date and see those names printed in a conspicuous place therein. According to the gentleman's theory, the publisher would have to print those names on every page of the paper simply because somebody might tear the pages apart or take the sections apart.

Mr. MANN. No. I take as an illustration the Sunday magazine, because it is in fact a periodical. The gentleman's amendment reads:

It shall be unlawful for any person to deposit in the mails of the United States any newspaper, magazine, or other periodical publication of like kind.

Mr. BARNHART. It does not say any part of a publication.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the Sunday magazine could not be deposited lawfully in the mails under this provision unless the owners of the publication had their names plainly printed in a conspicuous place thereon. Under the gentleman's contention the Chicago Tribune might print a supplement which it did not mail at all, and print the required information on that.

Mr. BARNHART. I will say to the gentleman that neither the Chicago Tribune nor any other publication in the United States can mail out a supplement unless that supplement contains the name of the publication through which it is circulated. As soon as it has that name printed on it it becomes just as much a part of the publication as any other part could be.

Mr. MANN. According to the gentleman's notion, every part of the publication that goes through the mail must contain the information, otherwise he would have to pay the penalty attached. Under this provision you can not deposit in the mails any publication, periodical, or magazine that does not contain this information.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARNHART. Now, Mr. Chairman, the difficulty with the gentleman from Illinois seems to be that he does not seem to be familiar with the fact that under the present post-office regulations every part of a newspaper publication must contain somewhere on each page the name of that publication—that is to say, if a supplement is inserted along with the rest of the paper——

Mr. MANN. That is not my difficulty. I was well aware of that; as much so as the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BARNHART. Then why would this provision subject you to a penalty if you took a part of that newspaper and mailed it? There is no prohibition in that provision against mailing any part of a legally published newspaper.

Mr. MANN. These Sunday magazines are such a periodical under the description of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. As I understand the contention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], it is based on the statement that the Sunday magazine is a periodical.

Mr. MANN. It is a periodical.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Then, if it is a periodical, if it were put by the publisher into the same mail with the daily paper, would not the publisher be subject to the same penalties under this act as a private individual would?

Mr. MANN. I do not think so. It may be sent out separate from the daily paper—separate from that section or part where the information prescribed by this amendment is contained.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Then the gentleman's contention is that if you send out any part of the Chicago Tribune without the page that contained the names of the owners or stockholders you would be subject to a penalty?

Mr. MANN. Practically so. If the gentleman means that the daily papers can not be sent out unless the whole is sent out in the mails, he gives away his whole case, because any paper that had a supplement might not send that supplement through the mails.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman claim anyone who mails it would be subject to a fine—any part of it?

Mr. MANN. Yes; any part of it.

Mr. FOSTER. Even a clipping?

Mr. MANN. He would. If it is a publication, he would. I do not undertake to say whether it would be so as to a clipping or not, but he certainly would be required, in prosecuting a case, to prove that the whole paper as it was entered in the post office in the regular distribution by the publisher was sent out.

Why does the gentleman want to apply this to an individual who mails something and knows nothing about what the law is?

Mr. BARNHART. I have no objection to putting this in. I think it is entirely superfluous, though.

Mr. MANN. I have seen many laws construed that were considered superfluous——

Mr. BARNHART. I want this amendment made water-tight, if it is possible to make it so.

Mr. FOSTER. If it does not kill the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BARNHART. I inquired of the Post Office Department, and they said that the mention of second-class matter might possibly exclude foreign publications, and that is what I wish to avoid.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman's purpose is publicity?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has excluded foreign publications by his amendment already.

Mr. BARNHART. No.

Mr. MANN. My proposition would not exclude them.

Mr. BARNHART. Well, the gentleman evidently did not listen to the reading of my amendment.

Mr. MANN. I both listened to the reading and went and looked at it.

Mr. BUTLER. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, it will require the publication of these stockholders every day, if the paper is published every day?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. The full list?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, suppose there are a thousand stockholders or bondholders having an interest exceeding $500, every publication of the newspaper must require that list to be published. Would not that be a burden upon the publisher? Could we not get the same publicity by publishing the list once a month?

Mr. BARNHART. That would eliminate the very purpose for which the amendment is offered, and that is to enable a person who reads a newspaper or magazine—who reads an editorial which strikes him as peculiar—to turn and see who is back of the sentiment that he reads. You can set about 60 names to the inch in small or nonpareil type in a newspaper. There are very few newspapers that would require more than a few inches. It might be a hardship in some cases, but not in many.

Mr. BUTLER. We do not all read the same newspapers, of course, but everybody reads some newspaper year in and year out. I think that is the habit of the American people. Therefore we could obtain this information without having it published every day. I am not quarreling with the gentleman's amendment at this time. Yet I think we ought to consider the rights of publishers; whether this is not a great burden to require them to publish this list of stockholders every day.

Mr. BARNHART. How many newspapers does the gentleman from Pennsylvania surmise there are in the United States that have 500 stockholders owning more than $500 worth of stock?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know, but I would be willing to take the gentleman's judgment on it, because he is better informed than I am.

Mr. BARNHART. As a rough guess, I would not suppose there are 50 in the United States. Where the stock of newspapers is distributed for the purpose of encouraging the newspaper, the stock is usually issued in very small denominations and sold accordingly. I have no doubt that many of you men have taken stock in newspapers, but you do not often take it in larger amounts than $500. There is a controlling interest of 51 per cent, and the general public takes the 49 per cent in small denominations. That is the way such things are done.

Let me say further that there are newspaper publishers and magazine publishers in the United States who go about exploiting get-rich-quick schemes. They publish newspapers and offer stock in various ways to the subscribers, and they fleece the public generally. That is another reason why I should like to have these names published, so we will know who is who as to promoters of that kind.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. POWERS. Unless the provision goes through as the gentleman from Indiana has provided, would it not be possible for a private individual to let the newspaper publish whatever he might want published, leaving out the names, which is provided for by the gentleman, turn it over to the private individual, and let the private individual mail it, and thus escape the penalty?

Mr. BARNHART. If the gentleman from Kentucky will tell me how the evasion could be stopped, it might be considered. I confess that these things could be done.

Mr. POWERS. I am in support of the gentleman's proposition. What I ask is that unless it goes through as the gentleman has framed it it looks to me that it is possible to send out a publication by this circuitous route; in other words, by letting the newspaper publish it and turning it over to the private individual, and then the private individual would not be subjected to the penalty unless it stands as the gentleman has framed it.

Mr. BARNHART. I can see how that might be done, but I have never found any way yet to prevent a man from evading the law if he sets out to do it and will take the risk of doing it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Indiana answer this phase of the question?

Mr. BARNHART. I do not know whether I can or not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the $500 limit reach the purpose that the gentleman aims for? You are after the crooked newspaper proprietor or the designing man in the ownership. Will your $500 limitation reach that man? In other words, you have a million-dollar corporation, which may do business on an authorized capital, say, of $1,000. How are you going to get the real but scheming proprietor—the man you are after—by fixing this limit at $500?

Mr. BARNHART. If the men are holders of the securities, they are liable.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, had you not better publish all of the names?

Mr. BARNHART. Such was my original amendment, but when the Committee on Rules got through with it they had changed it. I suppose, after consultation, it was seen, as has been repeatedly submitted to me, that it would be almost impossible where a publication has general community or fraternal stockholders to publish all of them——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "outstanding," in line 13 of the substitute, insert the following:

"Provided, That in the case of newspapers published daily, or daily except Sunday, it shall be sufficient to publish said names once a week on the same day each week."

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say at the outset that I am heartily in accord with the spirit of the Barnhart amendment. It is a good thing, since the object to be attained is to give the public notice as to who are the owners and editors and who the owners of the bonds or other securities of the various newspapers. Now, there are days during the week, for instance, the Saturday and Sunday issues of the daily morning newspapers and the Friday issues of the daily afternoon papers, when space is very valuable. Advertising matter and news matter are frequently crowded out on these days. They print as close to the margin as possible, eliminate date lines, and use fine print, and what would be convenient for them to publish on Monday or on Tuesday or on Wednesday would be most inconvenient and a hardship to publish on Friday for the afternoon papers and on Saturday and Sunday for the morning papers. It seems to me that a publication of these names once a week would meet every requirement for publicity. That is the usual provision for all legal notices. Now, to meet the statement of the gentleman from Indiana that a person on a train reading an item or editorial ought to know who is responsible for the sentiments therein expressed. I would say that if their names should not appear in that issue it is a very easy matter to drop a postal card or a letter to the publisher, or any news dealer, or to the postmaster of the place of publication to forward a paper of the date containing the list of owners, editors, and so forth.

So I say, Mr. Chairman, that as this amendment will meet all the requirements of publicity and at the same time not work a hardship on the publishers, for I can say that it will be a burden on the two or three days I have mentioned, I hope that the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Why does not the gentleman make it once a year?

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, there would be no publicity in that.

Mr. CANNON. In other words, the gentleman is one-seventh righteous and six-sevenths wicked. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. Well, I think I at least measure up to the gentleman from Illinois on the purity or dross test. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FOSTER) there were—ayes 64, noes 36.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. ALLEN, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. FOSTER, to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 64.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the words "to the amount of $500 or more."

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, under the amendment just adopted by the committee the publication provided for by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] is to be limited to once a week. I think it was very doubtful indeed whether the provision requiring only the names of those owning over $500 of stock or securities to be published could not have been avoided by placing large interests in the hands or names of numerous persons simply for the purpose of holding. If this provision is to be effectual at all, and we provide for publication only once a week, we ought to have the whole information and strike out the limitation which would limit it to stockholders or persons interested to the amount of $500. My amendment therefore simply strikes out those words "to the amount of $500 or more," and would provide that this weekly publication, when it does appear, should give absolute and complete information as to the names of all persons interested in the stock, bonds, or other securities of the publication.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment limiting it to $100 or more?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would it not be possible under the provision limiting it to $500 for those who are responsible to put the stock in the name of some one else?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I already stated that. I think that was an unfortunate limitation to begin with. It could be avoided by simply having the stock or interest in the names of several nominal owners and not the real owner, when the real ownership was in some syndicate or individual having the legal title to the property.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does not the gentleman understand that the author of this whole proposition is in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes, Mr. Chairman; I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by inserting, after the word "corporation," in the second line thereof, the words "publishing any newspaper, magazine, or other periodical of like character," and after the word "any," in the third line, insert the word "such."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment to the amendment is simply to limit the penalty to the parties who publish the magazine, newspaper, or periodical. As the substituted amendment now reads it provides that it shall be unlawful for any person, association, or corporation to enter or deposit, and so forth, any magazine, newspaper, or periodical, and so forth, so that if an ordinary individual in remailing a newspaper, magazine, or periodical should deposit it in the mail when such periodical violated the provisions of the amendment he would be subject to its penalties. If the amendment I have suggested be agreed to the clause would read, "that it shall be unlawful for any person, association, or corporation publishing any newspaper, magazine, or other periodical, to enter or deposit, or to have entered or deposited," and so forth.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. The publisher then could turn it over to the news agent or to any other agent who could mail it without any penalty.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, under the provisions of this amendment, it would be possible for a publishing company to publish the names of the editors and the owners of the publication, but still take the entire output to some individual who would have no stock in it, who could circulate it as his and use it as his own personal organ.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman how he intends to prevent the penalties of this act from applying to the individual who, without knowing the contents of the newspaper, remails it?

Mr. BARNHART. First of all, the publishers and owners of the newspaper will not issue a publication unless it does contain these names; but if they do, the man who mails the publication will be in just the same situation as a man who accepts stolen property.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, no publisher of a magazine has ever undertaken to sell his entire output. It would be impossible for him to manage a magazine or newspaper in that kind of a way. No one but the publisher can avail himself of the privileges of second-class mail matter. The party to whom the output was sold would be compelled to pay fourth-class postage if he wished to use the mails to distribute the periodical. No regular publication could exist under such circumstances, much less could the newspapers flourish, which the gentleman from Indiana seeks to affect. His amendment can never become a law in its present form, and the amendment which I propose ought to prevail.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, I think, was to meet a situation to which I called the attention of the committee a few minutes ago. Under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, any person who mails a paper that does not have the information provided for in the amendment is subject to a penalty of not less than $100. Now, what the gentleman desires to accomplish is to control the publication of papers that make avail of second-class mail privileges. What he does is to penalize individuals who mail papers and then you have a provision in this amendment which, apparently, would require every fraternal organization in the country to publish the names of all their owners, and that would apparently require the American Federation of Labor to publish the names of all its members, because its members are the owners of the publication and the members of the fraternal organizations are the owners of the publication. It is crude legislation, not called for, at least to the extent to which it goes; and the gentleman desires now to have a provision inserted in the law which does not even give the court a chance to allow leniency where no criminal intent was the purpose of the person violating the law, but a penalty must be imposed of $100. The gentleman has changed his amendment now four times since it was first introduced, and it ought to be changed more, not only by the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, but by other amendments which shall accomplish at least the purpose of preventing that which the gentleman desires to prevent without attempting to penalize half the people of the country who mail papers in the post office and pay full rates upon them.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, the argument of the gentleman from Illinois would impress me more had it not been for the fact he has notified me from time to time that he is opposed to the amendment. The fact of the matter is that in a colloquy the other day with the gentleman from Illinois, when I announced that it was rumored that certain interests controlling a Chicago newspaper that probably supports him in his campaign, and I think it ought to do it——

Mr. MANN. I regret that it does not. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARNHART. When I suggested it was rumored that certain influences controlled that newspaper, he disputed it and said he knew that they did not control it. The purpose of these amendments, it seems to me, is to weaken this amendment and to destfoy the effectiveness of it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARNHART. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I wish to say I am entirely friendly to the amendment, and there was no purpose of weakening or impairing the amendment, but simply to provide that innocent persons who pick up a paper and mail it to a friend would not be subject to the penalty under this law.

Mr. BARNHART. We have been over that ground. I believe I have explained to the full satisfaction of the committee that this act would apply only to publishers of newspapers, because it stipulates that every newspaper publication must carry the names in that publication before it can be circulated through the mails. Of course, if it is sold on the streets or through news agencies that is another matter, but this amendment could not possibly apply to that sort of publication. It does not stop a man from circulating a handbill, but it stops the newspapers from circulating anonymously through the United States mails.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARNHART. I will.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman just stated that he said the other day it was rumored that a Chicago paper was owned by a certain interest. Did not the gentleman state at the time that he knew that was a fact?

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman stated he knew it was rumored.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, he stated he knew it to be the fact. I shall get the original statement from the stenographer's notes on the subject.

Mr. BARNHART. If the gentleman will get the original statement I made preceding his interruption he will ascertain that I said that these rumors were afloat, and in conjunction therewith I said that I knew it——

Mr. MANN. I would not have taken the trouble to contradict a rumor.

Mr. BARNHART (continuing). And I think if the gentleman had paid attention to what I said just previous to his interrogatory he would have understood it.

Mr. MANN. Strange to say, I had been listening attentively to the gentleman.

Mr. KENDALL. Maybe the gentleman was not in when the gentleman from Indiana was making his speech.

Mr. HILL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. He has made no reply to the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in regard to this applying to fraternal organizations. It seems to me the language is clear and explicit that a paper or magazine published by a fraternal organization, or by a labor organization, under this amendment must have the names of all the parties having interest in it published according to the terms of this provision.

Mr. BARNHART. It does now. It did not previous to the adoption of the amendment striking out the $500 limit.

Mr. HILL. It did not previous to the adoption of the amendment, but as it stands now every Odd Fellows' magazine in the United States would have to be published with the name of every member in the jurisdiction which used the magazine.

Mr. BARNHART. It does, and therefore I introduced my amendment providing that the names of all stockholders holding more than $500 worth of stock be published.

Mr. HILL. But as it stands now they would have to publish them all?

Mr. BARNHART. They would have to publish them all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I propose to vote against the Barnhart amendment, because it serves unnecessarily as an entering wedge to the throttling of a free press. I want gentlemen to consider what they are doing when they vote away from a man who engages in the business of publishing a newspaper the right accorded to every other citizen and every other business man, to use the mails of the United States. You say if I am the publisher of a newspaper, whether it be a $3,000,000 enterprise or whether it be a country weekly, I can not use the mails of the United States without revealing all my business interests to my enemies and to my creditors. You do not require that of any business man or of any corporation doing business independent of the newspaper business who uses the mails of the United States.

You want to ferret out the man who is responsible for writing an article you do not like, but you are going to deny him the use of the mails if his article does not suit your fancy. You deny him the right to circulate what he writes, the right to circulate free speech by the instrumentality of the postal service of the United States.

In Pennsylvania we tried to find out who the proprietors of the newspapers were in order largely that men might bring libel suits. We did that as a matter of State jurisdiction. But you propose to refuse to a man who is doing business in the United States, the right to use the mails which are guaranteed to all of us, because he does not conform to certain conditions which can be ferreted out in his own State, and for which he is responsible in his own State. [Applause.]

I do not think when you give this matter a second thought that you gentlemen on the other side will propose to invite the criticism that will follow the passage of this amendment. I do not think when you have heard from every country newspaper editor, to whom you have responded to-day by passing the roads-subsidy proposition, after you have confiscated a part of his property by requiring him to use his space publishing his business in a conspicuous place every week, you may find you have acted wisely in passing this amendment to-day. I am drawing it to your attention. I do not propose to vote for this amendment. If you want to go after an editor, sue him in your State. If you want to go after a man who is doing a newspaper business improperly, or who is violating the rights of incorporation, you have your remedy at home. You may do a great injustice by this general denial of that right which is guaranteed to every other citizen of the United States—the right to do business through the post offices of this country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding after the word "outstanding," in line 12, the following:

"It shall also be unlawful for any person, or persons, or association, or corporation to enter or have entered into the mails of the United States any letter, circular, packet, newspaper, magazine, or other periodical of like kind, advertising or offering for sale, either directly or indirectly, any spirituous, malt, vinous, or other intoxicating liquors for transmission to or delivery in any State, county, municipality, or other civil subdivision thereof wherein the sale of such liquors is or may hereafter be prohibited by State or local law."

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that amendment.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] first.

Mr. BARNHART. The amendment, Mr. Chairman, is not germane. I have no argument to make, it is so clear. It has no reference to this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman if his amendment does not prohibit certain classes of publications from going through the mails?

Mr. BARNHART. It provides a penalty for the same; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the difference between that and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BARNHART. It is entirely different, because it brings in a matter that has no relation to the Post Office Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The Post Office Department has exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN. Will the Chair permit me to call his attention to the fact that there is no heading on the amendment? Whatever heading there is is superfluous. There is no heading to the proposition authorized by the Committee on Rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman to page 21 of the engrossed copy that I have. I have not the printed copy. The only thing that refers to it is on line 15 of page 21, which reads as follows——

Mr. MANN. I say there is no heading. I thought the Chair referred to the heading covering the subject matter.

The CHAIRMAN. No. The Chair was talking about the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

Mr. MANN. I understand; but the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana is based on a provision of the rule, and there was no heading read to the House. I do not know what may be on the paper.

The CHAIRMAN. To what did the gentleman refer?

Mr. MANN. I thought the Chair referred to the heading on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not refer to a heading.

Mr. MANN. I beg the Chair's pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY].

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, the matter of the construction of the rule adopted by the House last week was fully considered by the Chair yesterday, and his ruling was made. Now, the amendment offered by me here follows precisely the ruling heretofore made and, as the Chair has well suggested, the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] provides for a denial and prohibition of the use of the mails to a certain class of matter that is now mailable. The amendment that I offer denies admission to the mails of certain newspapers and other publications that are now admitted to the mails. The same penalty that is provided in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] will be provided in the amendment as submitted by me, to be considered now.

It is clearly germane. The amendment by the gentleman from Indiana is an amendment prescribing what is mailable matter. This amendment submitted by me prescribes what is mailable matter. The amendment I offer, dealing with the same class of mail, provides whether or not it is mailable and, if so, under what conditions it is mailable.

It is so apparently germane, Mr. Chairman, that I do not see how the gentleman can seriously raise a question against it.

It was suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yesterday that the rule is broader than that. I do not agree with the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, but my amendment is drawn to cover the particular subject matter now under consideration.

In reply to the gentleman from Indiana I will say that his only objection as stated is that it does not come under the jurisdiction of the Post Office Department. All letters, all circulars, all newspapers, all magazines are exclusively under the jurisdiction both of the postal laws and the postal regulations. The amendment I offer now simply changes the postal law as it now exists, and is entirely and certainly unanswerably germane to the pending amendment or to the pending substitute.

Mr. BERGER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire to speak to the point of order?

Mr. BERGER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] offers an amendment which would provide for the exclusion from the mails of publications of a certain character. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] offers an amendment to the amendment, which provides for the exclusion from the mails of certain other classes of publications. The Chair thinks the amendment is germane, and therefore overrules the point of order. [Applause.]

Mr. RODDENBERY. Gentlemen of the committee, I desire to address you for a moment touching this amendment. Certain States and certain counties——

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Certainly.

Mr. BARNHART. I would like to ask unanimous consent—not doing it out of the time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY]—to have the amendment read again.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I would be glad if it could be read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY].

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Gentlemen of the House, the object of this resolution is to give to the States and minor subdivisions of this country real and effective local self-government. My Democratic friends, who have been contending for a long time for the sovereignty of the States and local self-government, now have a chance to vote for it. [Applause.] My amendment, if adopted, will help make prohibition prohibit. Heretofore we have been telling our temperance friends that we could not get the bill favorably reported out of the committee. I have availed myself of this parliamentary opening to bring this measure directly and squarely to a vote on the floor of the House. I appeal to you to answer the prayers and demands of the prohibition and temperance sentiment of the country. We can no longer say to them that we can not get the chance to vote for them. We stand at this moment face to face with the opportunity. Remembering our professions and promises to the voters at home who sent us here, let us now with fidelity perform. Various States, townships, counties, and municipalities have prohibited the sale of and dealing in intoxicating liquors, but in defiance of that fact the Federal Government allows liquor houses and newspapers containing the advertisements of liquor houses, brewers, and distillers to flood the State, county, and municipality with their advertisements of rye, of rum, of gin, of beer, and all known kinds of booze. [Applause.] If you want the people whom we represent to have their laws better enforced and respected, deny to the wholesale and retail whisky houses the right, in disregard of local law and local sentiment, to send to the ministry, to the women, to the widows, and to all citizens through the mails advertisements of this nefarious traffic. [Applause.] My southern Democratic colleagues and my Republican friends, particularly from the West, whose constituencies have voted liquor out of townships, counties, and States—in Ohio, in Michigan, in Kansas, Indiana, in Iowa, Nebraska, and all around—have the opportunity now to stand by their people and vote for their protection. [Applause.]

It is said we can not enforce prohibition laws. I deny it. The people of our States and counties have passed these laws. We should clothe them with power to enforce them by withdrawing Government partnership with lawbreakers. Will Members refuse here to vote to have these laws respected by the Federal Government? If the State and local laws which our people have approved and enacted are valid, let us vote that their sovereign will be not be disregarded by the liquor interests through use of the postal service. Now is the time to shut out these defiant whisky houses, with their vice and crime breeding advertisements. [Applause.]

Millions of our pure women, under the organization of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union are crying out to us to protect the homes and children charged to their keeping. The great body of the churches and God-loving and law-abiding manhood of the Republic have the right to and do demand and expect that we vote for obedience to and regard for the State and local statutes outlawing the liquor traffic. To-day, for the first time, we have offered the opportunity to vote to allow the brewers, distillers, saloonists, and rum sellers to continue to defy the law and will of our constituency, or to rise to the supreme duty of the moment and vote to compel these malefactors who prey upon our homes and unfortunate men to obey and respect the will of sovereign freemen.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. If I can get the time. I want 10 minutes more, but can not get it. I yield to the gentleman, nevertheless.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to say to the gentleman that I favor his amendment, and I also will say to him that there is no paper in Kansas that carries any liquor advertisements.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I always thought well of Kansas and of the gentleman, and I now think better of both. I say to every gentleman here who has been telling the patient women and the preachers at home, "I am with you," it is up to you now. Gentlemen who have been for the moral uplift, for the children, and the good of the country, show it now by your vote when we have the first opportunity. The amendment merely provides that the will of the people shall not be overridden by foreign whisky establishments and by the newspaper that sells its columns in order that prohibited liquor may flow into prohibition territory, when the people have said they do not want it. How much longer shall the dry territory be flooded with defiant advertisements and whisky circulars? Gentlemen, it is both a fair and democratic proposal. Let us as Representatives stand for the sobriety of the people, the sovereignty, dignity, and enforcement of law. The question now for vote and determination is not whether we favor prohibition, but whether we stand for supremacy and enforcement of the law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. RODDENBERY), there were—ayes 55, noes 89.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were refused, 13 members, not a sufficient number, rising in support of the demand.

Accordingly the amendment of Mr. RODDENBERY to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that all debate on the amendment and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the words "into the mails of the United States," in line 3 of the substitute, the words "as second-class mail matter."

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment which I have offered may meet the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in regard to innocent persons mailing newspapers contrary to this bill; but that is not the chief purpose for which I offer it. That great jurist, long an ornament of the Supreme Court of the United States, Joseph Story, never uttered a wiser or more statesmanlike sentence than when he wrote this motto for the Salem Register:

Here shall the press the people's rights maintain Unaw'd by influence and unbrib'd by gain.

If that were the condition of the press to-day, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] would not be necessary, but we are "fallen on evil days," and we are obliged to resort to severe measures to restrain what was once the bulwark of our liberties from becoming the artillery park of "antirepublican tendencies." The amendment is a step, and but a step, in the right direction. I can foresee many methods by which this salutary amendment will be evaded, and, while I do not now offer any legislation on this subject, I desire to state from my own experience, and what is doubtless the experience of many gentlemen on the floor of this House, an example which will plainly show the need of restrictions like those presented by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], if not much more drastic ones.

If we wish to see where the editorial sentiments of the papers come from, we do not need to look so much at the names of the owners, stockholders, and directors as we need to look at the advertising pages of those newspapers. There is where the milk in the coconut is to be found. It is through that source that we can tell how the editors will write.

It was my fortune in attempting to restrain the monopolistic tendencies of modern commercialism to present two bills similar in form and in purpose, but relating to two different aspects of the ways in which the business in articles could be controlled. Those bills, as properly amended, are as follows:

[H. R. 11380, Sixty-second Congress, first session.]

A bill to prevent restrictions or discriminations in the sale, lease, or license of tools, implements, appliances, or machinery covered by interstate commerce.

Be it enacted, etc., That no person, firm, corporation, or association engaged in interstate commerce having any interest, whether as owner, proprietor, beneficiary, licensee, or otherwise, in any tool, implement, appliance, or machinery shall, directly or indirectly, in making any sale or lease of or any license entered into in the course of trade or commerce between the several States or with foreign nations or in any Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, or between any Territory of the United States and the District of Columbia, or any Territory of the United States or any State or any foreign nation, or between the District of Columbia and any Territory of the United States, or any State or States or foreign nation, to any such article, restrain or attempt to restrain or prevent the vendee, lessee, or licensee from using any tool, implement, appliance, machinery, material, or merchandise not furnished by or with the approval of the vendor, lessor, or licensor, whether by making any condition or provision, express or implied, against such use by a term of any sale, lease, or license to use, or by requiring any obligation, express or implied, against such use from the vendee, lessee, or licensee of the article, or by imposing any restrictions upon the use of the article sold, leased, or licensed, or by making in the price, rental, royalty, or other terms of any such sale, lease, or license any discrimination based upon whether the vendee, lessee, or licensee uses or purchases any such tool, implement, appliance, machinery, material, or merchandise or not, or by any other means whatsoever: Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent any such vendor, lessor, or licensor from requiring that during the continuance of any letters patent on any such article no patented component or constituent parts of the tool, implement, appliance, or machine required for use thereon be purchased except from such vendor, lessor, or licensor: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the appointment of agents or sole agents to sell or lease machinery, tools, implements, or appliances.

SEC. 2. That any such person, firm, corporation, or association who shall violate the provisions of this act, and any other person, whether or not an agent of such owner, proprietor, or beneficiary, who shall willfully or knowingly assist in or become a party to any such violation shall be punished for each offense by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 3. A proceeding in equity to prevent and restrain violations of this act may be brought by any person injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this act in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found or in which the act complained of was committed; and in addition thereto or separately therefrom may sue, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the costs of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

SEC. 4. The several district courts of the United States are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of this act; and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations. Such proceedings may be by way of petition setting forth the case and praying that such violation shall be enjoined or otherwise prohibited. When the parties complained of shall have been duly notified of such petition, the court shall proceed, as soon as may be, to the hearing and determination of the case; and pending such petition and before final decree, the court may at any time make such temporary restraining order or prohibition as shall be deemed just in the premises.

SEC. 5. Whenever it shall appear to the court before which any proceeding under section 4 of this act may be pending that the ends of justice require that other parties should be brought before the court, the court may cause them to be summoned, whether they reside in the district in which the court is held or not, and subpœnas to that end may be served in any district by the marshal thereof.

SEC. 6. Any property owned under any contract or by any combination or pursuant to any conspiracy (and being the subject thereof) mentioned in section 1 of this act and being in the course of transportation from one State to another or to a foreign country shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized and condemned by like proceedings as those provided by law for the forfeiture, seizure, and condemnation of property imported into the United States contrary to law.

SEC. 7. That the word "person" or "persons" wherever used in this act shall be deemed to include corporations and associations existing under or authorized by the laws of either the United States or the law of any of the Territories, the laws of any State, or the laws of any foreign country.

[H. R. 11381, Sixty-second Congress, first session.]

A bill to prevent restrictions or discriminations in the sale, lease, or license of tools, implements, appliances, or machinery, or the use of any method or process covered by the United States patent laws.

Be it enacted, etc., That no person, firm, corporation, or association having any interest, whether as owner, proprietor, beneficiary, licensee, or otherwise, in any letters patent of the United States covering any tool, implement, appliance, or machinery, method, or process shall, directly or indirectly, in making any sale or lease of or any license to any right under such patent or to any article which embodies or includes the invention covered by such letters patent, restrain or attempt to restrain or prevent the vendee, lessee, or licensee from using any tool, implement, appliance, machinery, material, or merchandise not furnished by or with the approval of the vendor, lessor, or licensor which does not infringe such letters patent, whether by making any condition or provision, express or implied, against such use by a term of any sale, lease, or license to use, or by requiring any obligation, express or implied, against such use by the vendee, lessee, or licensee of the article, or by imposing any restrictions upon the use of the article sold, leased, or licensed, or by making in price, rental, royalty, or other terms of any such sale, lease, or license any discrimination based upon whether the vendee, lessee, or licensee uses or purchases any such other tool, implement, appliance, machinery, material, or merchandise or not, or uses any such other method or process, or by any other means whatsoever: Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent any such vendor, lessor, or licensor from requiring that during the continuance of such letters patent no patented component or constituent parts of the tool, implement, appliance, or machine required for use thereon be purchased except from such vendor, lessor, or licensor: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the appointment of agents or sole agents to sell or lease machinery, tools, implements, or appliances.

SEC. 2. That any such person, firm, corporation, or associations having interest in any such letters patent who shall violate the provisions of this act, and any other person, whether or not as agent of such owner, proprietor, or beneficiary, who shall willfully assist in or become a party to any such violation shall be punished for each offense by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 3. That if any person, firm, corporation, or association is convicted a second time of any offense under this act in connection with such letters patent, such letters patent shall thereupon become null and void.

SEC. 4. Proof of violation of this act shall be a good defense to any action for infringement of any patent in connection with which said violation occurs.

SEC. 5. Any person injured by violation of this act may bring an action for recovery of damages against any party so violating, in any district court of the United States or in the district wherein the act complained of was committed or wherein the defendant resides or is found.

In connection with them and with the Lenroot bill, H. R. 15926, a long amendment to the Sherman antitrust act, lengthy hearings were held before the Judiciary Committee. At the time these measures were introduced in the House of Representatives the press of Boston especially took considerable notice of them, as the practices at which they were aimed were largely those of the United Shoe Machinery Co., of Boston. From time to time some mention was made of them in the papers, necessitated by the fact that the United States Government had, after these measures were introduced, brought indictments against some of the directors of the company and also a bill in equity for the dissolution of the company.

But when the hearings on the bill were begun, after brief notices of the opening days, some of the papers ceased all mention of the proceedings, and others mentioned only the evidence which appeared favorable to the United Shoe Machinery Co., but not the evidence advanced in favor of the measures, and not one of the Boston papers gave the final arguments in their favor. About the time the hearings were concluded Judge Gray had made a suggestion on the framing of the final decree dissolving the Powder Trust—that the Sherman Act does not make a specific regulation; it is much to be desired that Congress in its future legislation would so regulate commerce between States that, however drastic that regulation may be, the business of the country will be compelled to accommodate itself to it.

Judge Putnam, in the indictment of the United States versus Directors of the United Shoe Machinery Co., had said substantially the same. These decisions were followed by the dissenting opinion of a strong minority of the court—Justices White, Hughes, and Lamar—in the celebrated Henry case, where the division was four to three. Justice White said:

Because of the hope that if my forebodings as to the evil consequences to result from the application of the construction now given to the patent statute be well founded, the statement that the application of my reasons may serve a twofold purpose: First, to suggest that the application in future cases of the construction now given be confined within the narrowest limits, and, second, to serve to make it clear that if evils arise their continuance will not be caused by the interpretation now given to the statute but will result from the inaction of the legislative department in failing to amend the statute so as to avoid such evils.

On account of this decision it was seen that a change in the law was imperative, and the Boston newspapers, as well as the press of the country in general, took notice of these hearings which had been already held. The Boston Transcript, besides speaking specifically of these measures, devoted considerable space to the patent laws. But the question naturally arises, Why had not the press of Boston paid more attention to these measures, which were honestly intended to restrain monopolistic control and in which New England was peculiarly interested on account of the presence within her borders of one of the offenders of the law, and also because remedial legislation was advocated by one of her Congressmen? Their attitude may be explained in part by the following statement and editorial from the Boston American, which has always been the determined foe of monopoly, whether business or political, and also because—alas, too often we are compelled to look to the advertising columns of the newspaper to discover how the editorial and news columns will treat any subject related to its principal source of revenue:

[Boston American, Friday, Feb. 2, 1912.]

SHOE MACHINERY TRUST GOES INTO THE NEWSPAPER BUSINESS—HAS THE BOSTON "TRAVELER," GETS THE LYNN "NEWS," AND ADDS THEM TO THE "TIMES" OF GLOUCESTER AND "NEWS" OF NEWBURYPORT—EDITORIAL AGENTS LOOKING FOR OPPORTUNITIES IN SALEM AND HAVERHILL—BOUND TO HAVE NEWSPAPERS EVERYWHERE THAT WILL BE "FAIR-MINDED"—TRAVELER EDITOR, WHO WANTED TO PRINT A STORY THAT SHOE-MACHINERY WINSLOW DIDN'T WANT PRINTED, ISN'T THE TRAVELER EDITOR ANY MORE—SMITH AND HIGGINS, THE MEN ON THE TRAVELER JOB FOR SIDNEY W. WINSLOW, AND SMITH AND HIGGINS ARE ALSO THE MEN ON THE JOB IN LYNN, GLOUCESTER, AND NEWBURYPORT—PERHAPS THEY'LL PLANT A "FAIR" PAPER IN SALEM AND HAVERHILL, TOO.

Confirmation of the report that the Boston Traveler had passed under the control of the president of the United Shoe Machinery Co. was followed to-day by the discovery that the head of the Shoe Machinery Trust is also a big figure in at least three other Massachusetts newspapers and that his representatives in the newspaper field have their eyes on two cities more.

The president of the Shoe Machinery Trust is Sidney Wilmot Winslow. Mr. Winslow's shoe-machinery offices are located in Lincoln Street. His homes are at Beverly, at Brewster—the Cape Cod town where he was born less than 60 years ago—and at No. 10 Commonwealth Avenue.

President Winslow's bright young men in the newspaper business are Fred E. Smith, of Newburyport, once the Republican postmaster of the city at the mouth of the Merrimac, and James H. Higgins, also of Newburyport.

THE TRUST NEWSPAPERS.

The list of newspapers now controlled by Sidney W. Winslow, through Smith and Higgins, is as follows:

In Boston, the Boston Traveler; in Lynn, the Lynn Evening News; in Gloucester, the Gloucester Times; in Newburyport, the Newburyport News.

Why the shoe-machinery people should be interested in newspaper publications to the extent of securing editorial or financial control is a matter for conjecture, but it was pointed out to-day that in every case save one the shoe-machinery newspapers on the above list are published in what might be called shoe towns.

The Boston Evening Traveler, now completely under Winslow's control, is printed in the great wholesale center of the shoe business in North America.

Making shoes is the principal business of Newburyport, where Smith and Higgins get out the Evening News for Mr. Winslow. Lynn, where they print the News, is the "Shoe City" of the United States.

The attitude of the local press toward the shoe manufacturers in the shoe cities—and it is known that Mr. Winslow's young men have for some time been feeling out the probable chances for a paper in Salem and Haverhill—is an extremely important factor in the business of these manufacturers.

Shoe manufacturers may also have trouble with the assessors. In local paper is able to take the middle of the road in these controversies or it may side with one disputant or the other.

Shoe manufacturers may also have trouble with the assesors. In these disputes, also, it is not unpleasant to find the local newspaper your friend.

Suggestions of this sort have been made to American reporters who, for several days, have been investigating the great interest shown by the big fellows of the Shoe Machinery Trust in the newspaper business.

These suggestions appear to have been based upon suspicion most unjust, for, on the authority of a man who claims to know the situation in Lynn, the American was to-day furnished with information going to show that, in that city, at least, Mr. Winslow has merely taken steps to see that a paper which formerly was unfair shall hereafter be fairminded.

A COOLIDGE IDEA.

In addition to its four Massachusetts dailies—with at least two more to come—the Shoe Machinery Trust has for two or three years maintained one of the best press bureaus in the country.

This press bureau is supposed to have the benefit of the wisdom and experience of Mr. Louis A. Coolidge. Mr. Coolidge is treasurer of the United Shoe Machinery Co. He used to be famous as one of the best newspaper correspondents at Washington, D. C.

Coolidge in 1904 was president of the Gridiron Club at Washington. He had then been a Washington correspondent for more than a dozen years. He was a great friend of President Roosevelt. He was a member of the Roosevelt "tennis cabinet," and in the presidential campaign of 1904 the Roosevelt folks put Coolidge in as director of the Republican literary bureau.

In 1908 he was appointed Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. He might have gone higher—as high as Hitchcock—if Winslow hadn't come along with the proffer of a place paying considerable more money than Uncle Sam allows even the best of his servants. Coolidge became treasurer of the Shoe in 1909.

NO POLITICS IN MOVE.

In addition to its advertising in all sorts and conditions of daily papers, weekly papers, trade journals, souvenir publications, and monthly magazines, the press department of the United Shoe Machinery Co. has at times sent broadcast a lot of advertising to be run as "pure reading matter."

When Smith and Higgins, of Newburyport, under the kind patronage of Sidney W. Winslow, of the United Shoe Machinery Co., began the establishment of a syndicate of newspapers in northwestern Massachusetts, there was commonly supposed to be "politics" behind it.

The first guess was that John Hays Hammond wanted something. Mr. Hammond denied the soft impeachment. Gradually Mr. Winslow was uncovered, the Lord Bountiful of a free press.

If Mr. Winslow wanted anything in politics, it has not been apparent since the time when, in 1908, he set out to be an anti-Taft delegate to the Republican national convention from Beverly. His ambitions were rudely punctured at that time by Capt. Augustus Peabody Gardner, of Hamilton.

WHAT IS REAL PURPOSE?

There was, however, last July, a movement to put Treasurer Coolidge up as the Republican candidate for lieutenant governor. Not very much came of that movement at that time.

With these guesses removed from consideration, there is left the proposition that the shoe-machinery crowd desires to place newspapers in shoe-manufacturing towns for purposes which may appear later.

It is the belief of everybody on the inside at Washington, according to advices which came a day or two ago to the Boston American, that the shoe-machinery company is in a way of extricating itself from a very unpleasant position before the enforcers of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

It is, of course, well known that the shoe-machinery company is among the many which have been indicted under the Taft administration. There are cynics in Massachusetts who have thought that able gentlemen would make smooth the way of the "United Shoe" at Washington quite as other gentlemen made smooth the way of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad in Mr. Roosevelt's time.

TRUST HEADS AT WASHINGTON.

Not only Treasurer Louis A. Coolidge, formerly of the Roosevelt tennis cabinet, but Mr. Charles F. Choate, jr., one of the ablest, if not the ablest, extricator in New England, have been in Washington for many days in the interests of President Winslow's $50,000,000 corporation.

There was a report last week—since denied by the defendant company—that the Shoe Machinery Trust was about to throw up its hands and surrender. According to a Washington story which has come to the Boston American the Shoe Machinery Trust is getting ready to be let off easily. It is going to reorganize or readjust or re-something.

First of all the United Shoe has got to drop the "exclusive" feature out of its contracts with manufacturers. Apparently the shoe manufacturer is to be at liberty to buy and lease where he will.

And so, it is thought, the shoe-machinery people have decided that it will be helpful under the new agreement to have a daily newspaper in each of the shoe centers. Hence they have to-day the Boston Traveler, the Lynn News, the Gloucester Times, and the Newburyport News.

And they have been looking for footholds, as will be explained, in Salem and Haverhill. Shoe-machinery papers in these cities are to come later.

FIRST WINSLOW PAPER.

The first of the Winslow newspaper ventures was the News, of Newburyport. Jim Higgins, who took charge of this venture, was one of the Winslow protégés. Mr. Winslow is celebrated for his good judgment in picking able young lieutenants.

Fred Smith, who had been the Newburyport postmaster and who was close to the Republican State machine at that time, was associated with Higgins in the News venture. The relations that existed between these young men and President Winslow were well known in that corner of Essex.

Smith and Higgins did so well with the News, of Newburyport, that they next essayed Gloucester. Here they got control of the Times.

Next on the list of Smith-Higgins-Winslow papers came the Boston Traveler.

Mr. Winslow inserted his bright young men into the Boston Traveler quietly.

THE TRUST AND THE TRAVELER.

Nearly two months ago—on December 13, to be exact—there appeared in the Boston Post an item which said that a number of changes had taken place of late in the Boston Traveler. The Post item said that Mr. E. H. Baker, of Cleveland, Ohio, had retired as general manager and publisher of the Traveler.

Up to that time—and for some time—Mr. E. H. Baker, of Cleveland, had been the dominating factor in the Traveler. When the "Cleveland" interests took over the Traveler, Mr. Baker appeared as the Traveler's principal executive. The man "on the job," for Mr. Baker was Mr. Baker's son, Frank S., who has made his home in Quincy.

More than a year ago—or early last year—it became known in financial circles in Boston, and to those on the inside of Boston newspaperdom, that one of the "largest factors" in the Traveler was Sidney W. Winslow, of the United Shoe Machinery Co.

RUMOR OF TROUBLE IN CAMP.

To-day it is said that not only was this true at that time, but that other officials of the Shoe Machinery Co. are interested in the Boston Traveler in an alliance with Albert F. Holden, of Cleveland, Ohio, one of the principal officers of the United States Smelting, Refining & Mining Co. President Winslow is one of the directors of that company.

Along in the middle of last summer there were continuous rumors of trouble in the Traveler camp.

For one thing it was said that Mr. Marlin E. Pugh, then the managing editor of the Traveler, had been printing in the Traveler altogether too many things tending to annoy and displease President Sidney W. Winslow and the gentlemen quietly associated with Mr. Winslow at that time in the Traveler enterprise.

It also became known at about that time that Mr. Winslow, now supposed to be merely the "angel" back of the Traveler, had lost his admiration for Mr. E. H. Baker, of Cleveland, Ohio.

THE POST CORRECTION.

And, some time after midsummer, it became know that while Mr. E. H. Baker continued to be known as an official of the Traveler, Mr. E. H. Baker was no longer the gentleman who was giving orders in the Boston Traveler office. Then came the announcement that Messrs. Smith & Higgins had come in.

The item which the Boston Post printed on December 13, however, was corrected by the Boston Post on the following day.

On December 14, last, the Boston Post reported that Mr. Frank S. Baker (the son of E. H.), was and would continue to be the publisher of the Traveler. The Post said further, in this correction, that Mr. Frank S. Baker's father had never been active in the management of the Traveler but would continue to act, as before, as president of the Evening Traveler Co.

TRUST TAKES OVER LYNN NEWS.

And then the Boston Post went on to say that Mr. Frank S. Baker had "recently called into association with him Mr. James H. Higgins and Mr. Fred E. Smith, publishers of the Newburyport News and the Gloucester Times, who will act in an advisory capacity."

The picture thus presented, of the Bakers of Cleveland, Ohio, and Boston, Mass., digging up editorial "advisers" in Newburyport and Gloucester, caused some quiet merriment at the time. All this was well enough, however, until, lo, and behold, along came the Boston Herald last week with an item telling how the Lynn Evening News had been bought by Mr. Winslow's Smith & Higgins.

Representatives of the bondholders of the Lynn Evening News, the Boston Herald said last week, had sold the News to Smith & Higgins "free of the mortgage." The Herald identified Smith & Higgins as the gentlemen "who have recently secured a large interest in the Boston Traveler."

The Boston Traveler, it may be said in passing, did not print this item, nor has the Boston Herald "corrected" it.

Public sentiment, it has been pointed out by several with whom reporters of the American have discussed the shoe machinery newspaper syndicate in the past few days, has come to be regarded as a dangerous factor in the affairs of big business.

The larger corporations and the trusts, therefore, it has been pointed out, are on the qui vive with reference to the "development" of this public sentiment.

Having the Boston Traveler, the Newburyport News, and the Gloucester Times, Mr. Winslow and his friends next stepped into Lynn. There they took the plant of the Lynn Evening News.

The Lynn News was practically down and out. It had some $50,000 in outstanding bonds. The paper was largely controlled by the Lynn Gas Co. and the General Electric Co. When the paper blew up, indeed, there appeared in the list of its bondholders the name of President C. A. Coffin, of the General Electric Co.

Also there appeared there the names of former Gov. Eben S. Draper and former Lieut. Gov. Louis A. Frothingham.

Interesting stories are told in Lynn about the blowing up of the Evening News.

The gentleman who had dominated the paper for some time is said to have been a Mr. Bolton, of New Haven, Conn.

Mr. Bolton had an editor in charge of the Lynn Evening News who appears to have been of the same kidney as Merlin Pugh, the Boston Traveler editor, whose sayings and doings so annoyed the philanthropic Mr. Winslow.

Regardless of the fact that the Evening News bonds were in hands at least friendly to the Lynn Gas Co., this Evening News editor displayed a most unpleasant penchant for going after the said gas company and lambasting it fore and aft.

Whereupon, according to the gossip of Lynn, the gas people hied themselves to Publisher Bolton, saying, "What meanest thou?" and "Desist," and like manner of exclamation.

And the good Mr. Bolton, says the gossips of Lynn, threw up his hands as one who is guiltless and said, "I can not help it; it's me editor."

The which, as was soon to develop, did not go.

There came a day when it was time to pay interest on the bonds, and the cupboard was bare. The unpleasant editor had gone away some time previously, but the men of money were relentless, and there was nothing doing for the Lynn News.

At about this time the thought appears to have struck Mr. Winslow that the Lynn Evening News should be succeeded by a journal which would treat the business interests of Lynn fairly, and so it came to pass that Smith and Higgins added the Lynn Evening News to a string of papers which already included the Newburyport News, the Gloucester Times, and the Boston Traveler.

In addition to his controlling interest in the affairs of the Boston Traveler, President Winslow, of the Shoe Machinery Trust, has at least a friendly interest in the affairs of one other Boston newspaper.

President Winslow has been seen at the Hotel Touraine of late in the company of the editor of this other Boston newspaper. Vice President George W. Brown, of the Shoe, has apartments at the Touraine.

In Salem the United Shoe Machinery's newspaper set are reported to have made advances to Col. Robin Damon, who has printed the Salem Evening News for a great many years and is generally credited with having found a gold mine in it. Up to this time the Shoe Machinery newspaper set have merely made advances to Col. Damon.

The Haverhill situation is said to be that the Shoe Machinery folks are waiting for the psychological moment.

All of which interesting newspaper information is offered to the newspaper readers, the advertisers, and the newspaper people of Massachusetts for the good that it may do.

President Winslow, of the United Shoe Machine Co., wants the press of Massachusetts to be "fair." Of course President Winslow stands by the constitution of Massachusetts, which declares that "the liberty of the press is essential to the security of freedom in a State; it ought not, therefore, to be restrained in this Commonwealth."

[Editorial in Boston American, February 3, 1912.]

MONOPOLISTIC GAGGING OF THE PRESS MEANS THE POISONING OF THE WELLS OF AMERICAN PUBLIC OPINION.

The hundreds of thousands who read this newspaper day by day and who are each day steadily adding to their numbers will have read with amazement the exposure of press gagging which the American made on the first page of yesterday's editions.

It is an exposure which should blanch the cheek of every thoughtful citizen who reads it. Every paragraph, every line of the shameful story has full material to make men pause.

This story of the Shoe Trust and its controlled chain of newspapers is the opening of a chapter whose ending no man can foresee.

It is the unveiling, rather the unmasking, of a powerful conspiracy to muzzle the American press, to poison the wellsprings of American public opinion.

From the dawn of this Republic onward to this very hour the free, untrammeled, independent, patriotic press of America has been the stoutest bulwark of the people's rights and of the Nation's liberties.

Greater than fleets and armies, greater than all the genius of statesmanship, the press of America, free, independent, patriotic, has stood firm and strong and true against all injustice and against every encroachment upon the domain of the people's rights.

Every stone that was laid in the fabric of American institutions during the struggling days which followed '76 was bonded in the cement of a free and solid, patriotic, and independent American press, racy of the soil and loyal in all its utterances.

Is this bond in danger of dissolution? Is this long-cemented union to be melted "like snow before the sun," in the corroding acid of corporation corruptive influence?

Here is a question for the American people to face; no other people will face it for them.

It is an issue as deep and as pregnant as any that has reared itself since Washington and his confrères gave this Nation birth.

It is a problem as serious as any that has come before the people since the martyred Lincoln spoke his inspiring prayer upon the field of Gettysburg.

Gagging the press of America, bringing it under the control of monopolistic corporations, seven-eighths of whom are said to be persistent violators and defiers of the Nation's laws, is a crime fully in the class with the poisoning of the wells when hostile armies are on the march.

An independent, patriotic journalism is the very lifeblood of this Republic.

It is for the people to see that it endures.

My own home paper, the Worcester Evening Post, was, as far as I know, the only paper in New England that published full and adequate reports of both sides of the subject, as it always does, thus fulfilling the functions of a real newspaper.

The United Shoe Machinery Co. is a large advertiser—for what purposes its officers can best tell, for it has a virtual monopoly of the shoe-machinery business—in the metropolitan press, and therefore it can be, perhaps, inferred without any large stretch of the imagination that such a good customer's wishes must be respected. Now, during the pendency of these measures it has published in the New York Sun a full-page advertisement describing its works in Beverly and its general beneficence (?). An experience of a colleague of mine, the Hon. EDWARD W. TOWNSEND, of New Jersey, is somewhat similar. March 29 of this year he made a unique speech on the tariff, showing that the mortality among infants in the textile manufacturing towns was larger than elsewhere. Shortly afterwards a supplement of many pages appeared in the New York Sun describing the various textile industries of the United States.

I think that in order to have more perfect operation of the Barnhart amendment the sums paid by the largest advertisers should be quarterly or annually announced. Then perhaps the overt influences in the news and editorial columns might be revealed.

That one of the greatest agencies through which the English-speaking people obtain and maintain their freedom should now bid fair to become an instrument, if not to destroy it, at least to hinder its accomplishments, is a sad commentary on the plutocratic development of the last two decades. Was it for this that Wilkes suffered imprisonment and fought for years against the Crown; that Fox and Burke thundered their philippics in favor of an untrammeled press; that our own Hamilton fought and won; and that Greeley, Raymond, Webb, and Bennett built great newspapers? We who believe we are right fear no publicity. We are willing that the people should decide the justice of our cause, but we demand and will obtain an impartial hearing. But, perchance, "because their deeds are evil our opponents love darkness" and do not court publicity. Fortunately, there is one paper in the United States which does not contain any advertisements, avowedly, at least, and here, if nowhere else, a fair and impartial treatment can be given of subjects relating to the interests of the people with the confident trust that they will prevail.

Because right is right to follow right
Were wisdom in the scorn of consequence.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in the second sentence, the words "in whose interest or interests such article is published" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "contributing such article for publication."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, I will read the sentence that it is proposed to amend:

Also all editorial or other reading matter published in any circulating periodical for the insertion of which money or other consideration is accepted by the publisher or publishers shall be plainly marked "Advertisement," or signed by the name or names of persons in whose interest or interests such article is published.

And so forth.

Mr. Chairman, as that sentence now reads the article must be signed by the person in whose interest it is published. It seems to me that it should be signed by the person contributing the article for publication.

To illustrate the point: Some person may desire to insert in the newspaper an article in the interest of some candidate or some proposition of public interest. He may be willing to pay for it; he may want to advertise the merits of the proposition or of the candidate for whom he stands. Under this provision as it stands the person in whose interest it is published must sign it; that is, the candidate himself must sign it. It seems to me all that should be required is that the public know who is behind the article and, therefore, the person writing or contributing the article should be the one who should sign it instead of the person in whose interest it is published.

It is of a great deal more importance that the public should know who is writing an article in favor of a candidate, or in favor of a proposition, than it is to know in whose interest it is published.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's statement was that the matter was paid for. Under the bill, is it not simply sufficient to mark it as "Advertisement"?

Mr. STERLING. The bill provides that it must be marked "Advertisement" or it may be signed by the person in whose interest it is published; he may use either method. In case the person publishing it prefers to have it marked as an advertisement he can do so. The bill provides for that. If he adopts the other method he ought to sign the article, instead of requiring it to be signed by the person in whose interest it is published.

Mr. MANN. But if it is a paid advertisement purporting to be a contribution by some one, ought it not to be marked "Advertisement"?

Mr. STERLING. The person ought to have the option of marking it "Advertisement" or publishing it over his own signature. The bill provides both methods, and the amendment which I offer does not change that feature. In some instances the person would prefer to use the word "Advertisement," and in other cases he might prefer to use his own signature and let it be known that he stands for a certain proposition or a certain candidate. The bill provides that he may use either method, and I think that is perfectly proper, but it seems to me that if it is required to be signed by anyone it should be by the person publishing the article and not by the person in whose interest it is published. The public is entitled to know who is behind matters and movements of public interest.

Mr. YOUNG of Kansas. Does not the gentleman think that the article itself ought to be marked "Advertisement"?

Mr. STERLING. The bill provides the two alternatives very wisely. It may be marked an "Advertisement" or signed by the person in whose interest it is published. I think the alternative ought to be given. There might be cases where one would prefer to use the word "Advertisement" and others where he would not, but in any event it ought to be signed by the person contributing the article instead of the person in whose interest it is published.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, we have here an example of how a bill, introduced with the best of intentions, can be turned into an insane piece of legislation. The paper with which I am connected, the Milwaukee Leader, Mr. Chairman, has over 8,700 owners and stock and bond holders, counting some trade-unions as individual stockholders. In order to print that list of names with the stock and bonds held by them would require a page and a half every week, even if the list is printed only once every week, as the amended bill now requires.

Mr. KINDRED. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BERGER. No, sir; not now. I want to make my statement first. Furthermore, it seems to me that the politicians are trying to get even with the newspapers which are continuously prying into the private affairs of the politicians. The politicians want to know everybody connected with the papers and thus get the best of them. You can never do it, gentlemen, because in the end the newspapers will have the last word every time, no matter what you do. [Laughter and applause.] If you get the ill will of your own party papers you might just as well quit the political game.

Moreover, there is a great danger lurking behind the proposition. The freedom of the press is involved. For the first time since I have been in the House, I am inclined to agree with my friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. MOORE. [Laughter.] The amendment as it reads now is really a grave attack upon the liberty of the press. In the case of the Milwaukee Leader the stockholders of the paper are workingmen, with very few exceptions. Just imagine. If their names appear as stockholders of a Socialist paper they are liable to be blacklisted by the manufacturers, who are bitterly opposed to socialism and naturally hate every Socialist paper, and especially the Leader.

The amendment is impossible and ridiculous. It is one of the worst attacks upon labor papers ever proposed, and that attack hides behind the cloak of reform. For hundreds of years in the old country the people have fought for the right to express their opinion in the press. And the people ought surely to have the right in this country to own a mouthpiece and to express their opinions without being in danger of losing their jobs as a penalty.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. Certainly.

Mr. BARNHART. What per cent of the stockholders of the publication which the gentleman from Milwaukee——

Mr. BERGER. From Wisconsin, if you please.

Mr. BARNHART. Which the gentleman from Wisconsin controls, own more than $500?

Mr. BERGER. I do not have control of the stock and bonds of the paper. Moreover, Mr. Chairman, I understand that the $500 provision was stricken out.

Mr. BARNHART. I am simply inquiring.

Mr. BERGER. Probably six or eight stockholders and a larger number of bondholders. Among them are quite a few trade-unions and the central committee of the party. Under the provisions of the gentleman's bill we should have to print the names of some 20,000 members of the Federated Trades Council of Milwaukee. That alone, with their address and a statement of their stock or bonds owned, might take up 10 pages.

Mr. BARNHART. I was not in favor of that.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that an amendment will be offered to correct that.

Mr BERGER. Mr. Chairman, I am glad of that; otherwise the 20,000 names of the members of the Federated Trades Council and the 8,700 stockholders would take up the space of the paper and we could not print anything else. We could not even tell our people in Milwaukee that this is the only kind of reform they can expect from the Democratic side. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that all debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "securities," in line 10 of the amendment, insert the words "to the amount of $550."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DODDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the paragraph insert the following: "Provided, That nothing in this paragraph contained shall apply to or include periodical publications published by or under the auspices of fraternal or benevolent societies or orders or trades-unions."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment which I offered a moment ago by adding, after the word "dollars," the words "or more."

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute, in order that I may ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know whether that would include the Federated Trade Council of Milwaukee, which owns about $1,500 worth of stock in the paper. Would they have to print the entire list of names of 23,000?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. BERGER. Every one of them is an owner—23,000; that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], just adopted, after the words "five hundred and fifty dollars" insert the words "or more."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer as a substitute the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The privileges of second-class mail matter shall not be given to any newspaper, magazine, or other periodical that shall not contain in plain type the names of the publisher and editor of the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SHERLEY) there were—ayes 50, noes 69.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] were appointed to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 42, noes 76.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana as amended.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 76, noes 32.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. DODDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 25 of the bill and to the end of line 6, to the amendment introduced by myself and made part of the bill on the 22d instant, and I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to return to page 25, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman to state what his amendment is.

Mr. MANN. Let the amendment be read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 18, page 2 of the amendment, after the word "by," insert the words "or under the auspices of."

Mr. DODDS. This is simply to make the language of the first proviso conform to the rest of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. We inserted that language at one place.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have no objection.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DODDS. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment which I desire to offer for the same purpose.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent has been given to return.

Mr. MANN. Unanimous consent was given to return for the purpose of offering the other amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Now the gentleman asks unanimous consent for the purpose of offering this amendment. The Chair understood the gentleman to ask unanimous consent to return to this portion of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. MANN. Which we had reported for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 19, page 2 of the amendment, after the word "orders," strike out the comma before the word "trades," strike out the word "by," and at the end of the line, after the comma, insert the words "or by."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That no person in the classified civil service of the United States employed in the postal service shall be removed therefrom except for such cause as will promote the efficiency of said service and for reasons given in writing, and the person whose removal is sought shall have notice of the same and of any charges preferred against him, and be furnished with a copy thereof, and also be allowed a reasonable time for personally answering the same in writing; and affidavits in support thereof; but no examination of witnesses nor any trial or hearing shall be required except in the discretion of the officer making the removal; and copies of charges, notice of hearing, answer, reasons for removal, and of the order of removal shall be made a part of the records of the proper department or office, as shall also the reasons for reduction in rank or compensation; and copies of the same shall be annually reported to Congress and furnished to the person affected upon request, and the Civil Service Commission also shall, upon request, be furnished copies of the same or the originals thereof: Provided, however, That membership in any society, association, club, or other form of organization of postal employees having for its objects, among other things, improvements in the condition of labor of its members, including hours of labor and compensation therefor and leave of absence, by any person or groups of persons in said postal service, or the presenting by any such person or groups of persons of any grievance or grievances to the Congress or any Member thereof shall not constitute or be cause for reduction in rank or compensation or removal of such person or groups of persons from said service.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the section of the bill which has just been read provides for relief to postal employees against unwise Executive orders which have been issued from time to time by the executive department. In order that we may get a clear understanding of it I will read it again:

SEC. 6. That no person in the classified civil service of the United States employed in the postal service shall be removed therefrom except for such cause as will promote the efficiency of said service and for reasons giving in writing, and the person whose removal is sought shall have notice of the same and of any charges preferred against him, and be furnished with a copy thereof, and also be allowed a reasonable time for personally answering the same in writing; and affidavits in support thereof; but no examination of witnesses nor any trial or hearing shall be required except in the discretion of the officer making the removal; and copies of charges, notice of hearing, answer, reasons for removal, and of the order of removal shall be made a part of the records of the proper department or office, as shall also the reasons for reduction in rank or compensation; and copies of the same shall be annually reported to Congress and furnished to the person affected upon request, and the Civil Service Commission also shall, upon request, be furnished copies of the same or the originals thereof: Provided, however, That membership in any society, association, club, or other form of organization of postal employees having for its objects, among other things, improvements in the condition of labor of its members, including hours of labor and compensation therefor and leave of absence, by any person or groups of persons in said postal service, or the presenting by any such person or groups of persons of any grievance or grievances to the Congress or any Member thereof shall not constitute or be cause for reduction in rank or compensation or removal of such person or groups of persons from said service.

This provision is intended to restore certain constitutional rights and preserve them to the postal employee which he has apparently lost by the invasion of the executive department in the past. It is unfortunate that in this, the twentieth century of civilization, we should be compelled, by legislative enactment, to restrain the hand of the Chief Magistrate of the foremost Government in the world, yet that is just what this paragraph is intended to do. The first amendment to the Constitution provides for free speech, peaceable assemblage, and the right to petition for a redress of grievances. This is one of the most important features of the Constitution, and certainly one of the most important to the American citizen, for it was intended to preserve his individuality, and whenever wronged to give him the right to meet his friends, collectively, for the purpose of taking counsel of them as to how he may best relieve himself from such wrong and, if found necessary, to petition for a redress of grievances. Notwithstanding this provision of the Constitution, the Executive has seen fit to promulgate decrees which in terms nullify and destroy the effect of all three of these fundamental rights. I hold in my hand a copy of one of these decrees, which is so severe in its terms that it takes away from more than 200,000 postal employees all three of these constitutional rights and reduces them to a beggarly servitude. It reads as follows:

APPOINTMENTS, PROMOTIONS, AND REMOVALS IN THE EXECUTIVE CIVIL SERVICE.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., October 10, 1905.

To officers and employees of the Post Office Department and others concerned:

Attention is invited to the following Executive order, dated January 31, 1902:

"All officers and employees of the United States of every description, serving in or under any of the executive departments, and whether so serving in or out of Washington, are hereby forbidden, either directly or indirectly, individually or through associations, to solicit an increase of pay or to influence or attempt to influence in their own interest any other legislation whatever, either before Congress or its committees, or in any way save through the heads of the departments, in or under which they serve, on penalty of dismissal from the Government service."

Attention is also invited to the following provisions of the civil-service rules, promulgated March 20, 1903, effective April 15, 1903:

"No recommendation for the promotion of a classified employee shall be considered by any officer concerned in making promotions, unless it be made by the person under whose supervision such employee has served; and such recommendation by any other person, if made with the knowledge and consent of the employee, shall be sufficient cause for debarring him from the promotion proposed, and a repetition of the offense shall be sufficient cause for removing him from the service."

Section 2 of rule 1 provides in part that:

"No question in any form of application or in any examination shall be so framed as to elicit information concerning the political or religious opinions or affiliations of any applicant, nor shall any inquiry be made concerning such opinions or affiliations, and all disclosures thereof shall be discountenanced. No discrimination shall be exercised, threatened, or promised by any person in the executive civil service against or in favor of an applicant eligible, or employee in the classified service because of his political or religious opinions or affiliations."

Section 3 of rule 1 provides that:

"No recommendation of an applicant, eligible, or employee in the competitive service involving a disclosure of his political or religious opinions or affiliations shall be considered or filed by the commission or by any officer concerned in making appointments or promotions."

Officers of this department and its bureaus, having supervisory authority, are directed to enforce strictly these provisions and to report promptly all cases of failure to observe them.

GEO. B. CORTELYOU,
Postmaster General.

It will be seen from this order that all employees of the Government, either in or out of Washington, in the various departments, are placed under the same ban as that of the postal employees. Our ancestors in the old countries struggled for religious liberty and fled to the wilds of America to escape punishment at the hands of imperial bigots, but after they had established their own churches and became masters of society they banished men of conscience who disagreed with them in religion, and in many instances tortured and executed them under the charge of witchcraft. It is the history of all ages that men newly elevated to power often forget the rights of the toiling many, and in order to exemplify their own personal importance dictate grievous orders so severe in terms as to subject the citizen to indignities and impose upon him hardships often endangering his life and health. This order is so severe as to prohibit the postal employee, either directly or indirectly, individually or collectively, through associations of any kind, from soliciting aid for the purpose of relieving himself, no matter how long the hours of his toil or how grievous his burdens. His mouth is closed and he has but one alternative, and that is to endure the hardships imposed upon him or give up his job. The penalty imposed for a violation of this order is a dismissal from the Government service.

By what authority was this order promulgated? Can anyone answer? There is no authority for it. Section 1 of Article I of the Constitution solemnly declares that "All legislative power herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States." Congress alone has the power to enact laws. It is the duty of the executive department to enforce the law, and it is the duty of the courts to construe the law, but here we have the Executive invading the rights of Congress, enacting law by the promulgation of a decree. The courts have from time to time encroached upon the rights of Congress and usurped to themselves the right to legislate by virtue of blanket injunctions, and have punished citizens of the land summarily for the violation thereof without a trial by jury. By virtue of decrees they have made these injunctions perpetual, thereby giving them the same force as if enacted into law by the solemn act of Congress. Following the example of our courts, the executive department has assumed to itself the right to make laws and, like crowned heads without parliaments, promulgated decrees, styled "Order No. —," as the case may be, dividing it into sections and giving it all the appearance of a valid law, wherein citizens of the country—laboring men—have been deprived of their constitutional rights. The object of this new piece of legislation is to unhorse the Executive in his wild ride. Unless something is done to check these two great and growing constitutional departments of our Government in their mad march of conquest for new powers they will in the course of time swallow up the legislative department, and if Congress exists at all it will be in name only.

If the farmer desires to rid his wheat field of wild onions, he must begin the fight when the onion first makes its appearance by pulling it up by the roots and carrying it away from the field and casting into a fire built for its destruction. If he should wait until the onion spreads all over his field the fight will be in vain and he will be forced to abandon wheat raising on that field. This "gag rule" is a wild onion from the executive department, with the stench of its odor trying to establish itself in the fertile soil of legislative dominion. Let us pull it up by the roots and destroy it in the fire of our zeal and love for the Constitution as it came from the righteous hands of our forefathers.

Mr. Chairman, the present Executive, much to his credit, has somewhat modified the severe terms of this order by issuing the following orders:

SECTION 2.

REMOVALS AND REDUCTIONS OF CLASSIFIED EMPLOYEES.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 28, 1911.

Order No. 5999.

Under date of December 9, 1911, the President issued the following Executive order amending civil-service rule XII, relating to removals and reductions of classified employees, which is hereby promulgated for the information of the Post Office Department and the postal service:

"RULE XII.—REMOVALS AND REDUCTIONS.

"1. A removal or reduction may be made for any cause which will promote the efficiency of the service, but like penalties shall be imposed for like offenses, and no discrimination shall be exercised for political or religious reasons.

2. A person whose removal is proposed shall be furnished with a statement of reasons and be allowed a reasonable time for personally answering such reasons in writing; but no examination of witnesses nor any trial or hearing shall be required, except in the discretion of the officer making the removal. Copy of such reasons and answer and of the order of removal shall be made a part of the records of the proper department or office, and the commission shall, upon its request, be furnished with a copy of the record in the case. The above procedure shall be followed in like manner in any reduction in grade or compensation.

3. Pending action under section 2 of this rule, a person may be suspended or temporarily dismissed without notice for a period not to exceed 30 days, but the reasons for such suspension or dismissal shall be filed in the records of the proper department or office.

4. The commission shall have no jurisdiction to review the findings of a removing officer upon the reasons and answer provided for in section 2 of this rule, nor shall the commission have authority to investigate any removal or reduction unless it is alleged, with offer of proof, that the procedure required by section 2 of this rule has not been followed, or that the removal was made for political or religious reasons.

Order No. 6206.

APRIL 10, 1912.

Under date of April 8, 1912, the President issued the following Executive order (No. 1514), which is hereby promulgated for the information of the officers and employees of the Post Office Department and postal service:

"It is hereby ordered that petitions or other communications regarding public business addressed to the Congress or either House or any committee or Member thereof by officers or employees in the civil service of the United States shall be transmitted through the heads of their respective departments or offices, who shall forward them without delay with such comment as they may deem requisite in the public interest. Officers and employees are strictly prohibited, either directly or indirectly, from attempting to secure legislation or to influence pending legislation, except in the manner above prescribed.

"This order supersedes the Executive orders of January 31, 1902, January 25, 1906, and November 26, 1909, regarding the same general matter."

FRANK H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General.

The number of the order of April 10, 1912, is 6206. If all of the Executive orders prior to this one carried with them the elements of laws it reveals very forcibly how extensively the Executive has been engaged in making laws by promulgating decrees.

Some time ago I received a letter from Mr. Walter, editor of the Harpoon, in which he comments on this order. I print it in full, except that portion relating to myself. Mr. Walter appeared before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and furnished us with some very valuable information on this subject.

DENVER, COLO., April 12, 1912.

HON. ROBERT FOWLER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On the 10th instant the President, by Executive order issued through the Civil Service Commission, in a way rescinded the "gag rule."

The new order makes it mandatory upon officials in charge of the various branches of the civil service to forward to Congress and its committees all petitions which their subordinate employees may draft and present; also making it compulsory upon the employees to forward all such petitions through their superior officials.

This order marks a considerable advancement in the struggle for justice which has been waged within the civil service, but it does not allow the full right of direct petition, nor does it guarantee the right of employees to personally appear before congressional committees or to organize into associations having for their purpose the mutual advancement of the employees in connection with their positions.

However, the order of the President is an emphatic recognition of the right for which we have contended, and in which you have so generously assisted us in the past with your expressions of opinion, which have been published in The Harpoon; and therefore, in behalf of the clerks, I wish to congratulate you on the stand that you have taken on this question and to thank you for your past assistance.

I still believe that the Lloyd bill, which guarantees the full right of direct petition and the right to organize, should be passed, as should also the clause in the Post Office bill for that purpose, as now pending.

* * * * * * *

Yours, truly,

U. A. WALTER, Editor.

The right of the employee to petition directly to Congress or the committees thereof is not recognized in this order, Mr. Chairman. No one should be forced to act through agents or proxies, but all men in America ought to be freemen, with the right to act in person if they see fit in all matters which concern their welfare or happiness.

Mr. Chairman, on close examination it will readily be seen that neither of these orders restores the postal employee to the full measure of his constitutional rights. He still goes about his work with a solemn mien and bowed head. His conversations are held in whispers and his councils are held in secret chambers at unusual hours. That a class of intelligent people should live and labor in such awe and dread is no credit to our free institutions. We want men at the head of this Government like Thomas Jefferson, who know that this Republic was founded upon the doctrine of equal and exact justice to all and special privileges to none; men like Lincoln, whose consciences are schooled in the doctrine that no man is good enough or wise enough to govern another without his consent, and that he who would deny liberty to others is not worthy of it himself; men who have the courage to follow the example of Jesus when confronted with the sin of temptation and unhesitatingly declare to all enemies of liberty, "Get thee behind me, Satan;" men who have the moral courage to respect and be governed by the greatest rule of action ever prescribed for the social conduct of men, "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you."

Mr. Chairman, I have had an occasion to collect some very interesting information connected with the work of railway postal clerks, through the assistance of Mr. Carl C. Van Dyke, of Chicago, once in this class of service but now retired, which will give an idea of some of the hardships connected with this class of service. It deals with the Railway Postal Service between Chicago and Minneapolis. It is intended to illustrate the extreme test to which some of these employees are subjected. It must be remembered that they are required to master the routing of the mail so that they can pitch it without making a mistake, because the speed of the train is so great and the mail is often so large that the force is wholly inadequate to make the proper distribution, and without that high grade accuracy on the part of the force in charge, mails would be delayed for want of proper handling while in transit. To do this, I am informed by those engaged in the business for many years, requires constant study of the most acute and laborious character. I am informed by the same authority that the force is often so inadequate now that the mail often becomes so congested that it can not be distributed and must be sent to some center for rerouting, thereby delaying its destiny for one and two days at a time.

DELAYED TRAINS.

I now desire to call the attention of the House to the effect delayed trains have on the work of these postal railway clerks. Mr. Van Dyke has furnished me with the data of delayed trains during the months of January and February of this year between Chicago and Minneapolis, which I will extend in the RECORD:

Report of arrival of Chicago & Minneapolis railway post office trains during the months of January and February, 1912, as shown in official records.

Mr. Chairman, this data of late trains, when considered in connection with the high rate of speed traveled, the long hours of continuous physical and mental strain, forces us to the inevitable conclusion that two great evils exist in this class of work which impairs our mail service, one of which is overwork of the employee, which incapacitates him for his best service, and the other is the inadequate supply of men to do the work, often occasioned by the overwork of the crews. Long hours of physical servitude are very trying on the human system, but when coupled with long hours of continuous mental strain the drain on the system is doubled and its effects are far-reaching and much more serious.

The crew on train No. 1 go to work in Chicago at 2 p. m. and arrive in Minneapolis at 7.45 a. m. the next morning, making one continuous run of 17 hours and 45 minutes, during all of which time the crew is put to the extreme test of both physical and mental activity. During the entire months of January and February last this train was not on time more than two or three times, and it has been behind as much as 6 hours and 45 minutes, thereby increasing the already long consecutive working hours of the postal clerk from 17 hours and 45 minutes to 24 hours and 30 minutes. The crew on train 57 go to work in Chicago at 6.36 p. m. and arrive in Minneapolis the next day at 11.21 a. m., making one continuous run of 17 hours and 15 minutes, during all of which time the postal clerk is compelled to exert himself both physically and mentally without ceasing. This train was late every day during the entire months of January and February, sometimes as late as 5 hours and 35 minutes, thereby increasing the long hours of servitude of the postal clerk from 17 hours and 45 minutes to 22 hours and 50 minutes. During these two months the postal clerks put in on this train alone 146 hours and 46 minutes extra time on account of delay without any compensation whatever. During these two months each clerk put in 24 hours and 30 minutes extra time without pay.

The postal clerks on this line, not including the extra time occasioned by delayed trains, average 8 hours a day for 313 days in the year. The work is too hard and will necessarily result in poor mail service. I am told that these crews are undermanned and are wholly inadequate for the amount of work to be done. As a result, the trains arriving in western terminals have large amounts of unworked mail, which must be carried back to St. Paul in order to make connections out at that point, thereby delaying important mail at least 24 hours. This gives bad service and ought to be corrected by putting on more men and giving them shorter hours of consecutive work. The service demands it, and fairness to the railway postal clerk demands it.

Take the line between New York and Pittsburgh. Train No. 45 on this line leaves New York at 6.30 p. m., but the crew are required to begin work at 3 p. m. in the railway post office at New York until the train leaves. It arrives in Pittsburgh at 3.57 a. m. the next morning, giving the clerks a continuous run of hard work for 12 hours and 57 minutes. The mail crew go on duty on train No. 21 at 11 a. m. and work continuously until it arrives at Pittsburgh at 2.16 a. m. the next day, giving to these clerks a consecutive run of hard physical and mental strain of 15 hours and 16 minutes. This is the schedule time and whatever time is put in because of the delay of trains adds to the already long, arduous hours of toil. Trains 28 and 29, mail trains between New York and Pittsburgh, two of the fastest in the world, have a schedule time of 8 hours, yet the clerks are required to make 3 round trips on these trains, with but 4 hours off at New York, traveling a distance of 2,634 miles, a distance of more than two-thirds across the American Continent, performing active services all the time, with an accumulation of mail often too large to be worked. What is true of the work on these two great thoroughfares is more or less true with all of the mail service on other lines.

Mr. Chairman, ordinary labor is conducive to good health, but long hours of consecutive labor requiring a high tension of mental activity will destroy health in the course of time. I am told by those who have been in this class of service for many years that in order to keep up with the requirements it is necessary for the clerk to go over the work continually, thereby taxing his mental powers constantly at a high tension, endangering his life and health.

As a result of long hours of consecutive hard labor, entailing upon the clerk prolonged acute mental strain, without rest, many of these unfortunate employees have lost their reason and died in madhouses. A short time ago the press reported a case of a railway-postal clerk who was employed on the mail trains between New York and Chicago, who became unbalanced, left the train, and went to the seashore and committed suicide by drowning. On one of our main thoroughfares, within the last few years, no less than eight of these employees became unbalanced and died in madhouses. I have all of their names and the place of their confinement, but I can not give them to the public, neither can I give the source of my information for fear that the Post Office Department will wreak vengeance on some unfortunate postal clerk by dismissing him from the service. This is the first time I have ever been confronted with fear and trembling, not so much for myself, but for public servants who brave the dangers to life and health in order that the public may be supplied with the intelligence of the times. This is enough to make the skeleton of Jefferson turn over in its quiet grave at Monticello and speak with the rattle of bones that immortal prophetic warning, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

Mr. Chairman, there ought to be an investigation by Congress to determine the extent of the burdens of these postal clerks, with expert medical testimony as to the effect long hours of continuous physical and mental strain have on the health and lives of these public servants. There is no doubt in my mind but that they are taxed unreasonably and that the long hours should be shortened and a frequent opportunity given for rest. I am inclined to believe that six hours is long enough on these fast mail trains for a day's work. This great Government should have proficiency in its public service, but it ought to be humane and spare its servants from pain and suffering brought about by unreasonable hours of toil.

We have a law on the statute books prohibiting the railroads from working railroad employees more than 16 consecutive hours on trains. I think this is too long, and I have no doubt but in the course of time the number of hours of continuous work will be shortened. The safety of the traveling public and the life and health of the servant and his happiness demand it. But in the postal service we permit employees to be taxed for nearly 18 hours of consecutive work without rest, wherein the powers of the mind and body alike are required to be wrought up to the extreme tension reaching in many cases the breaking point.

It is said that one drop of blood shed by a master's lash outweighed a nation's gold. Is one drop of such blood worth any more to the nation than the mind of a public employee, dethroned of reason by the torture of long hours of mental strain, taxed to the breaking point? How much more gold is the one worth to the nation than the other? There is this difference: In the one case it is the individual who is the master shedding blood by the lash and in the other it is the nation, taxing employees with long hours of extreme mental strain, which unbalances them and sends them to madhouses to languish and die. The question of liberty and humanity are involved in one the same as in the other. I say, Mr. Chairman, that it is a disgrace to the American people that such a condition should exist in the public service of the United States, and I am ready to cast my vote to correct such inhuman practice. [Applause.]

I insert in my remarks some interesting observations by Messrs. C. W. Lahr and August Bindeman on the hours of railway postal clerks, and so forth, which is taken from the hearings before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads:

HOURS OF ROAD DUTY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 26, 1911.

Hon. JOSEPH STEWART,
Second Assistant Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In presenting the resolution passed at the Syracuse convention, which is as follows: "Resolved, That we think a minimum of five hours and a maximum of six hours road duty should be considered as the standard for a day's work," we desire to say:

This resolution was drawn in a spirit of fairness, after careful thought, by a committee of men familiar with all the conditions pertaining to the service. It received the unanimous indorsement of the convention.

At the beginning we desire to impress upon you that the Railway Mail Service is a service peculiar to itself, and no other service under the Government, and, for that matter, no other work or profession, resembles it in a general way.

The duties of a railway postal clerk are twofold in their character, i. e., constant mental activity combined with rigorous physical effort. Herein lies the difference from all other public or private service, for nowhere else is this required in so great a degree. Under these circumstances, was the order of the Post Office Department fixing a standard day for the Railway Mail Service altogether warranted by the existing conditions and especially in setting the minimum so high, namely, 5 hours and 45 minutes to 6 hours and 30 minutes?

The kind of work we do, the conditions under which we do it, as well as the preparation necessary for the proper performance of this work, entitles us to the most liberal consideration from the Post Office Department.

In presenting argument in support of the resolution we wish to dwell more particularly on the physical phase of the question than on a comparison of runs or lines or with other professions.

It must first be remembered that the railway mail clerk is a physically fit person. He must have passed a careful and searching examination by a responsible physician. He must be sound in all his members and have possession of all his faculties.

The course of preparation necessary for him to follow is complex as well as thorough and must be constantly studied by him during his entire official life. His value as a servant to the department depends on his application to these studies, for the reason that as soon as he neglects them his work deteriorates and the public's interests suffer; hence the necessity for his constant attention.

The time devoted in the preparation for our work is equivalent to the time spent in preparation for any of the professions. The degree of excellence required is almost absolute perfection, and anything less than that is reflected in the checking system. This spurs men to constant study and strict attention to their duty.

The railway mail clerk must put up in examinations every three years from 6,000 to 15,000 cards or offices, and these must be reviewed at regular intervals. The percentage required is 98 or better, a higher percentage than is required by any institution of learning in the land, and on this feature of our work rests the fabric of the Post Office Department.

It is an acknowledged fact that the efficiency of the Railway Mail Service of this country can not be approached anywhere in the world, either for accuracy or dispatch, and this high state of proficiency is only possible by constant application.

In describing the physical labors involved in the performance of our duties we hope to show that the strenuous character of our work entitles us to the most liberal time allowance.

On the heavy trunk lines, where the trains are made up of two or more cars, and where sufficient porter help is not allowed, considerable time is consumed in dragging and piling the heavy block matter dispatched from the important publishing centers. It frequently happens that large quantities of this class of mail are received at one junction, and when dragged and piled the men are nearly in a state of exhaustion.

This work is done under the most adverse conditions on rapidly moving trains and swaying cars. Men are frequently compelled to handle sacks weighing from 150 to 190 pounds, requiring two and often three men to pile the same. The lifting under these conditions subjects the men to an unusual strain and very often results in permanent injury. In the performance of work of this character, under existing conditions, the liability of rupture is always present and it frequently occurs.

The constant strain to the nervous system is one of the most important features in our consideration and worthy of much thought. Competent physicians say the railway mail clerk does not regain his normal condition within 24 hours to 36 hours after ending his tour of duty, and that complete rest from mental or physical effort should follow to restore depleted vitality.

At the same time the nature of our work exposes us to contagion or infection. The dust-filled cars, caused by the unclean sacks and pouches, furnishes the medium through which disease may be communicated.

We also desire to call your attention to the constant eye strain. A man with defective eyes or vision can not enter the Railway Mail Service, yet disordered vision is one of the most common ailments among clerks. Light experts claim the light least injurious to the eyes is the soft diffused light, well scattered and of equal brilliance. But years of experience proves to the postal clerk that to perform his duties he must have an intense light and concentrated brilliance. Working under these conditions rapidly affects the eyes.

We would ask you to carefully consider the irregular habits imposed on the men by the exigencies of the service. Pinkerton's motto, "We never sleep," is equally true of the Railway Mail Service. In many cases the men are compelled to completely reverse their natural habits and perform service under directly opposite conditions. This is no easy matter, and must necessarily cause a constant struggle with nature. Irregular hours for working, eating, and sleeping, combined with the other exactions, deserve consideration.

We would remind you that the department makes no compensatory allowance for service performed at night. Canada makes a distinction and pays the night lines a larger salary and travel allowance.

One of the principal arguments in support of this resolution is the reason first stated. The work is of a twofold character—mental combined with physical. Herein lies our strongest claim for concessions. The kind of service we perform is best shown by describing a night's work. Last Friday night three city distributors on one New York and Pittsburgh train worked 1,037 packages of letters, averaging 345 packages per man. The average number of letters to the package is about 30, making 10,350 letters to be distributed by each man. Had anyone told an inexperienced person to stand before a case and push his arm back and forth, piston-rod like, for that number of times he would have said it was a physical impossibility; yet this was done, and not that alone, for every movement of the arm was directed by a distinct mental effort, accurately controlling the destination of each letter. It was, indeed, a marvelous piece of work, yet it is being done daily by the distributing force of the Railway Mail Service. It would be beyond the range of human possibility for anyone to work at this speed for any great length of time. Complete mental and physical collapse would be the inevitable result.

This is the machine, composed of bone, nerve, and tissue, the Post Office Department expects shall give from five and three-fourths to six and one-half hours' service as a minimum for a standard day of road duty.

I tell you, sir, the railway postal clerk is not a machine. There is a limit to his powers of endurance. The department knows the work requires the greatest mental activity as well as the most exhausting physical effort, and this combination, unless surrounded by the most favorable conditions, must surely be destructive to health.

Another reason for favorable consideration: The department does not allow us compensatory time for the services performed on the road in excess of that required for a standard day's work. By way of illustration: On all lines where the time from going to work at advance distribution until arrival at the other terminal exceeds the average for a standard day's work the excess or overtimes should be calculated as time and half time. For example, if the standard day for the line be 6 hours and the time consumed in advance distribution and between terminals be 12 hours, then credit should be given for 6 hours plus 6 hours plus 3 hours' overtime, or 15 hours, and proper credit should be given the men for this time on the organization sheet. This is in conformity to the customs of all corporations. At the same time it is fair on account of the unusual service exacted from the clerk. Also, the clerks should not be made to suffer by reason of the changed conditions due to the modern times. The race for mail contracts and prompter service has tightened the schedules on most roads, and, instead of the men being charged for the time taken from them, they should be given allowance for working under the more strenuous conditions.

In fixing the standard for a day's road duty proper credit was not given for the services rendered to the Government during the lay-off period. Consultation with a score or more representative clerks shows that credit should be given for the time used in the performance of the following duties:

	Hours.
Examinations:
3½ annually—average of 8 days per examination	224
Correcting cards and schemes for examination	32
	256
Scheme corrections for distribution, average 1 hour per week, 52 weeks	52
Reviewing distribution, 1 day each lay-off period, 30 periods	240
Drawing and preparation of slips and labels:
1 hour for drawing.
3 hours for preparation.
4 hours per tour, 30 tours	120
Delayed connections and protecting delayed mails, as shown by New York and Pittsburgh railway post office	29½
15 days leave of absence	120
All clerks	817½
Clerks in charge (additional):
Trip reports, 6 per tour, at 45 minutes, 30 tours	135
Monthly reports, 12, at 1 hour and 30 minutes	18
Correspondence, clerical work required by office verifying pouch records, furnishing data, etc	60
	1,030½

There is another important item to the New York and Pittsburgh railway post office. The standing requirements are that clerks on lay off must be available at three meal hours awaiting orders: Three hours per day, 6 days per lay off, equals 18 hours; 30 tours, equals 540 hours.

Figuring as a year's service 313 days of 8 hours each, or 2,504 hours, it is readily seen that crediting us with the time spent in road duty and work on lay off, we are putting in a great many more hours than are legally required.

In support of the claim for annual leave of absence we desire to say:

The order of the department bearing date of January 16, 1911, indicated a determination to exact six and one-half hours average road duty, which order was somewhat modified under date of February 5, 1911.

All the official utterances on the subject lay great stress on the reasonable claim that the department has a right to have and receive the same hours of labor from the railway postal clerks as govern the industrial world, namely, eight hours.

The difference between the length of a day of road duty and the average industrial day of eight hours is conceded to the clerks as being absolutely necessary for the purpose of study, examinations, scheme corrections, rest, and all other demands generally believed to be necessary in order that the clerks may keep themselves up on their work and distribution. This allowance, then, coupled with whatever actual time of road duty may be required, constitutes an average day of eight hours for six days a week, Sunday being excepted.

Such being the case, and the figures, arguments, and comparisons being the department's own, the claim is made that we do not differ in effect from those clerks who run daily, except Sunday, and are by law entitled to 15 days of leave, with pay, each year.

It is expressly understood that no claim is made that the law gives the trunk line clerks a right to such an allowance as is claimed, that of 15 days' leave yearly, because the law is silent beyond providing that clerks who run daily, except Sunday, should have this allowance.

The same laws, however, governing the action of the department are just as silent upon the subject requiring an average 8-hour day, except Sunday, for the trunk lines; from 5 hours and 45 minutes up to 6 hours and 15 minutes to be credited to road duty, the balance for all the other demands upon the clerk's time.

Inasmuch as there does not seem to be any likelihood of a restoration of old conditions, including runs, hours, etc., and that an average 8-hour day must be given by the clerks, why should not an allowance of 15 days be granted as claimed?

It is further insisted that while there is no precedent for such action, just as there is no law therefor, why not establish the precedent which can be held to take the place of law, just as the precedent of demanding an average eight-hour day was established?

If it should be held that the trunk-line clerks, by nature of the demands upon trunk lines, could not reasonably be conceded this time allowance, the same to be actually enjoyed without interference, then let it be understood that the clerks on such lines would accept in lieu thereof an average daily time allowance equal to said 15 days, or 23 minutes per day, the same to be applied and credited to the present daily average made by each clerk.

That the request above outlined is reasonable and based upon that principle of justice which gives to each and all that measure of equality before the law is our belief, and we trust it will be granted us in one or the other forms asked.

Returning to the consideration of our resolution, I would say: The hazardous nature of our work entitles us to concessions. The clerk is constantly exposed in the most dangerous part of the train, entirely ignorant of any impending danger until it is too late to make any effort to save himself. The number of men killed and injured while in the performance of their duties is large. While it is true there are measures being taken to remedy this complaint, yet the danger remains and should have its relative weight in these calculations.

We hold that a strict compliance with the above resolution would not be possible on account of the inflexibility of it, yet we do not think that the department should rule that the lines or runs which are below the minimum should be brought up to the minimum unless the lines or runs which are above the maximum are brought down to the maximum. It is a poor rule that will not work both ways.

In attempting to conform to the high-standard day required by the department many cases of hardships come to our notice. We shall only mention two, and in both cases we think action should be taken to correct the existing conditions.

On New York and Salamanca railway post office, trains 1 and 2, one crew was withdrawn, compelling the men to make three round trips, a distance of 2,550 miles, as shown in the schedule. The daily average prior to withdrawing this crew was 5 hours and 40 minutes. The change raised the daily average not to 6 hours and 15 minutes, as required by recent rulings, but to 6 hours and 53 minutes. It is apparent the changes were based on a tour of inspection made during an interruption of the wagon service in New York City, when almost all the paper mail was missed. No account seems to have been taken of this unusual condition. The true situation is that the run is a very hard one, with a sufficient quantity of mail to work the men from terminal to terminal. The distance, as well as the time required, for a tour of duty is excessive, and conditions should be speedily adjusted.

I desire to refer briefly to one other case. On the New York and Pittsburgh railway post-office trains 28 and 29 the clerks are required to make three round trips between New York and Pittsburgh. The round trip is made in 24 hours from time of leaving Pittsburgh. It is impossible for them to get more than four hours' sleep in New York City before they must return to Pittsburgh. After their arrival in Pittsburgh and they have had a few hours' sleep, they are compelled to report at the Pennsylvania Station and perform service for two hours on New York and Pittsburgh railway post-office train 18. After this service they are permitted to return to the dormitory for the balance of their rest. It is an unwarranted condition. After men have worked 888 miles with but 4 hours' sleep on two of the fastest trains in the world, where traveling alone is exhausting without doing any work, we do not think the urgent needs of the service require this sacrifice on the part of the men. The only reason this is imposed on them is to bring their daily average up to requirements and not because train 18 needs them.

Briefly summarizing, we would ask your favorable consideration of this resolution, for the following reasons:

1. The exhausting mental and physical labor necessary for the proper performance of our work.
2. The complex and thorough character of our study.
3. Not sufficient credit allowed by the department for duties performed on the lay-off period.
4. The hazardous position in which we are required to work.
5. The severe hardships imposed on many men in attempting to conform to the high-standard day.
6. No compensatory time allowed men who are on duty for a longer period than is required for a standard day.
7. No compensatory time allowed men who work on the high-speed trains over those who work on the slow trains.
8. No compensatory time allowed for annual leave of absence.
9. The combined time required of the men in road duty and work on the lay-off period exceeds the amount required for a legal day's work.
10. We believe concessions in conformity to this resolution would in a very great measure allay the feeling of unrest now in the service and would soon restore the esprit de corps which is such a valuable asset to the Post Office Department.

Respectfully submitted.

HOURS OF ROAD DUTY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 26, 1911.

Hon. JOSEPH STEWART,
Second Assistant Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

SIR: When we review the struggle that is progressing in this land for the betterment of the civil, social, and economic conditions, we are forced to the conclusion that the Government can not afford to be anything but a model employer. Applying this principle to the cause before us, let us indulge in some comparisons.

I know of no fairer comparison to make with a railway postal clerk than that with the train crew with which he runs. Both are subject to the conditions of an occupation away from home; both are subjected to mental strain and physical discomfort. I will make my comparison on the Pittsburgh & St. Louis line, because I am more familiar with it and can prove my statements.

Train crews in train 18 (between Columbus, Ohio, and Pittsburgh, Pa.) return in train 45; they must report for duty at 8.35 a. m.; they are relieved from duty on the return trip at 7.45 a. m.; having 23 hours and 10 minutes tour and 24 hours and 50 minutes lay off every two days. They are actually on duty in train 18 six hours and in train 45 five hours and five minutes, and these figures each represent a day's work. Train crews (between Columbus, Ohio, and Indianapolis, Ind.) in train 11 return in train 18; they report for duty at 3.30 p. m. and are relieved on the return trip at 9.10 a. m., having 17 hours and 50 minutes tour and 30 hours and 10 minutes lay off every two days. They are actually on duty in train 11 five hours and five minutes and in train 18 six hours and five minutes.

Train crews in train 20 return in train 25; they report for duty at 2.30 p. m. and are relieved on the return trip at 7.30 a. m., having 17 hours tour and 31 hours lay off every two days. They are actually on duty in train 20 five hours and in train 25 five hours and forty-five minutes.

Train crews in train 13 return in train 14; they report for duty at 9.15 p. m. and are relieved on the return trip at 12.45 p. m., having 15 hours and 30 minutes tour and 32 hours and 30 minutes lay off every two days. They are actually on duty in train 14 five hours and twenty-five minutes and in train 13 five hours and 20 minutes.

Bear in mind that these figures include 30 minutes before schedule departure and 20 minutes after schedule arrival. These men state that their duties have never been increased nor salary lessened by a shortening of the schedule. Between Indianapolis, Ind., and St. Louis, Mo., a peculiar system of running obtains whereby a train crew has the same set of trains only once every 13 days, so that like figures are not easily obtainable; but, being under the same management, they are equally well situated, with this difference, their run is longer (about 50 miles), but for these extra hours they receive about $200 per annum additional compensation.

In conversation with a number of these passenger conductors I learned that it takes about 15 years for an efficient, capable man to rise from the bottom to the top in the train service, which is about the same time it takes a substitute to become a clerk in charge in an established railway post office.

They have short working hours and more than half time off at home. Beyond this the comparison becomes one-sided.

Their study is the book of rules, not as much as our Postal Laws and Regulations.

Their mental work is light and the physical is not exhausting. Some of these men collect tickets four times in a trip and may receive train orders as many times.

They and their families are provided with free transportation.

Their old age is provided for without thought or expense on their part.

Their annual income is from $2,000 to $2,400.

The trunk lines are not the only arteries of the Railway Mail Service, but are practically all the standard railroad service of the country. Stimulated by ambition and competition, they are the possessors of the solid roadbeds and the high-speed trains. An attempt to place all the service upon a fixed "hours-of-duty" basis alone places an unequal burden upon these lines instead of arriving at an equality. These men labor under extreme mental, physical, and nervous tension; they are unlike any other laborers; others give little thought as to how much shall be done, but look forward to quitting time; these men look at the stint set them, and their actions are more like those of a salvage corps at a fire—a pace that can not be kept up for long.

Ten years' observation on a great distributing line has shown us that of 100 new men 40 are worthless for this business. Many of the remainder drop out almost immediately, or at least before they become an asset. What will be the result, we ask you, if the exactions of the service are to be made greater and the attractions correspondingly less?

Personally I have served for more than 20 years in a great railway post office, and whatever is done can not affect me for long; but I am making this appeal for the future of the service that I have seen more than treble, which has been my life work's pride and in which you and I have a common interest.

There is on file in the office of the honorable general superintendent a letter written by me, under date of January 6, 1911, addressed to the honorable Postmaster General that I wish shall be made a part of this statement.

Very respectfully,

C. G. MENDENHALL.

HOURS OF ROAD DUTY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 26, 1911.

Hon. JOSEPH STEWART,
Second Assistant Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In presenting to the Post Office Department some general considerations touching the question of a standard workday in the Railway Mail Service, I shall leave to my colleagues the presentation of those phases of the question proceeding more particularly from the viewpoint of the strict self-interest of the employees of the service. It shall be my task, with your kind indulgence, to attempt in an humble way to point out that a stern enforcement of that we are bound to regard as an arbitrarily determined workday may and inevitably must result in a deteriorated efficiency. Believing that it is no less our duty than our privilege to set forth frankly our views upon the subject matter in mind, no further apology shall be offered than that the views herein set forth are not original with myself but are culled from current expositions by high authorities on the science of the management of bodies of men.

It is peculiarly my province, while not essentially any more fair-minded than my colleagues, to consider the question before us from the "other" side, from the administrative standpoint, in so far as it is given me to be judicially minded enough so to consider it. It may be proper to state that the general principles are set forth, not dogmatically but as a means of illustrating and testing, by the considerations of private practice, the departmental position upon the question of the present standard of a workday in the Railway Mail Service.

It is a favorite retort of managers, and one that is usually expected to squelch the protestant employee, to say, "We, too, put in long hours. You ought not, then, to 'kick.'" And yet so eminent an authority as Mr. Fred W. Taylor, the father of scientific management, says:

"The fact * * * that managers are * * * overwhelmed by their work is the best proof that there is something radically wrong with the plan of their organization, and in self-defense they should take immediate steps toward a more thorough study of the art."

Another eminent authority, imbued with a sense of the importance of his subject even to the point of enthusiasm, declares:

"It is because I have an abiding faith in the destiny both of my country and its inhabitants that I urge the application to its affairs of efficiency principles. That its people have in the past abundantly made use of a high order of near common sense justifies the belief that in the future it will surpass other nations in the use of supernal common sense. Let us therefore grasp the difference between the two, and, having grasped it, let us wake up to some of the principal present stumblingblocks in our national corporate and individual paths."

As indicating the ground of approach on the part of hard-headed business men broad enough to view the relationship of employer and employee (or public servant and manager) in its more comprehensive aspects, I may be permitted to quote again from Mr. Taylor:

"It is safe to say that no system of scheme of management should be considered which does not, in the long run, give satisfaction to both employer and employee, which does not make it apparent that their best interests are mutual, and which does not bring about such thorough and hearty cooperation that they can pull together instead of apart."

Another singularly successful manager of men states the matter even more concisely:

"To handle men, they must be treated as friends and coworkers, not as automata."

The art of management has been defined as "knowing exactly what you want men to do, and then seeing that they do it in the best and cheapest way."

That this art is not predicated upon any hard and fast rules is made manifest by the declaration:

"Scientific management is not any particular system (rigid or otherwise), but a body of principles; a particular way of looking at the whole problem of industrial operation."

As in a measure elucidating, if not justifying, the conditions that obtained among the rank and file of the Railway Mail Service last winter, and without any intention to convey the impression that the characterizations are applicable to the conditions that have obtained or may still obtain in the department, I may be permitted to quote somewhat extensively from Mr. Harrington Emerson, a noted efficiency engineer, as follows:

"[The most] evil characteristics [of poor management] are * * * arbitrariness, irresponsible exercise of power, harshness, cruelty, with anarchy all along the line."

"The vagueness, the uncertainty, the aimlessness that characterize employees is but an infiltration of the vagueness, uncertainty, and aimlessness that characterize employers."

"A high American railroad official of great and long experience told me that no grievance committee of wage earners had ever come to him with what seemed unreasonable and unfair demands that he had not been able to find as the original incentive to their action the arbitrary injustice and tyranny of some insignificant local official, foreman, or boss."

"I have intimately watched the inception, progress, and end of three railroad strikes. Twice they were precipitated by the arbitrary action of irresponsible yet conscientious and able railroad officials."

"A great railroad superintendent * * * told me that no unreasonable demand had ever been made on him by a labor organization that he could not trace * * * back to some act of petty injustice by a foreman of poor judgment."

All these general considerations, of course, have a purely general bearing. Without pretending that private and public employment are precisely parallel, I am making a special application of them to the workday standard established by the department for the Railway Mail Service, because just in the particular matter of establishing an arbitrary and inflexible minimum workday it would seem to the workers immediately concerned that the department had apparently failed to justify itself to the common sense and, I may say, the common humanity of its servants. We, most of us, are not insensible or not by any means indifferent to the many inefficiencies and wastefulness suppressed and abolished. The relief from the onerous blue-tag matter; the reduction in the use of equipment; the vastly closer correlation of the different branches of the entire postal service are immense improvements of the great importance to which we are not at all oblivious. Moreover, we gladly recognize the organizing genius which brought them about. But in all industrial operations, those of the Post Office Department included, there is a human factor, which, if ignored or neglected, is bound ultimately to render nugatory the best planned organization ever conceived in the brain of man.

On the New York and Chicago railway post office, as well as on others, there obtains a system of lap runs. In the case cited it was, to all appearances, imposed simply and solely arbitrarily to raise the work time to a standard that may have been in the departmental mind here at Washington, but which was never promulgated for years afterwards.

Last winter, after finally promulgating such a standard, the employees in the most continuously strenuous occupation in the Government employ were required in the heaviest period of the year to yield up that part of their rest period that the wisdom of nearly 50 years had regarded as their absolute due. This not so much without pay, but positively as a comparatively heavy expense to the employee for every extra trip he made. If the department had in any way profited thereby, the procedure might possibly have been justified on the principle of absolute authority from which there seemed to be no adequate appeal. But beyond the necessities of the service this proceeding was kept up and justified, if that be the correct term therefor, by the plea that the organization sheets were thus symmetrically rounded out to an even, uniform figure. Apparently no thought was given the efficiency principle where merely the human factor was involved.

Efficiency is said to be a ratio expressing the relation between the results achieved and the energy necessarily expended in obtaining those results. Measured by this principle, altogether disregarding the humanitarian idea or the sense of justice, the episode was, we believe, generally and in a large measure indefensible.

While it is true that one of the basic ideas of correct management is the predetermination of standards of efficiency, still, as has been said, "efficiency, like hygiene, is a state, an ideal, not a method; but in America we have sought our salvation in methods," and by the same eminent authority: "Accounting, however accurate and minute, can not of itself bring about efficiency."

In Mr. Harrington Emerson's elaborate expositions of the 12 principles of efficiency he assigns the first five to those of conduct and the latter seven to those of operation. His five principles of conduct bearing upon efficiency are: (1) Definite ideals, (2) common sense, (3) competent counsel, (4) discipline, (5) the fair deal.

We respectfully submit that in the application of the work standard in our service the department has fallen short of these ideals set forth by a mere business manager for mere business reasons, and that those in the public employ are entitled on the most obvious principles of justice to at least equally generous treatment.

In this connection it may not be inopportune to quote a large employer, writing from the employer's viewpoint, as to what consitutes honest work, with the statement that every railway postal clerk can conscientiously subscribe thereto:

"Honest work at lowest cost; at high speed, if required, but none the less honest work and the lowest cost for the speed (is the consideration). Honest work means honest workers, not one only in a few, but all; honest in the sense of taking an interest in the work and personally desiring that it shall be done well. Such an attitude is not one of muscle, but of mind or intelligence, and hence honest work in the true sense demands that everyone engaged upon it shall participate in it on the intellectual side and not merely on the physical."

I had intended writing my notes on driving and speeding up, but find that I have already seriously imposed upon your consideration, and so will forbear.

The remainder of this paper may be regarded as a string of quotations upon what authorities, men of practical experience in handling men, have said upon the humanitarian phase of the subject matter in hand—in other words, of the human factor.

"Reasonable hours, too, are a necessity if good health and a maximum output are to be maintained. A comparison of overtime with regular-time production would show in almost every case a heavy decrease in the production after hours."

"To establish rational work standards for men requires indeed motion and time, studies of all operations; but it requires in addition all the skill of the planning manager, all the skill of the physician, of the humanitarian, of the physiologist, of the psychologist; it requires infinite knowledge, directed, guided, and restrained by hope, faith, and compassion."

"Rather than drive harder, it is more equitable to pay for extra normal time required."

"Longer hours than 10 (in one continuous stretch) are wholly deleterious to both worker and shop. I never knew any advantage to result from promiscuous overtime. It should always be a serious emergency resource, and the bonus should be very high to men, and loss of shop efficiency be chargeable to all officials."

"If we can not control the hygienic conditions of the homes of the working classes, we can at any rate insist that in the factory and workshop the conditions under which work is carried on shall be as healthy as possible; that means shall be in use to carry away dust; that the temperature and humidity shall not be too high; and that the air shall contain even less carbon dioxide than is allowed by law. If the employers wish to have tidy and clean workmen, they must keep their factories clean. Change of clothing will probably cause the worker to make a better meal on reaching home than the unwashed workman."

"These general-welfare considerations have their effect on the contentment of the worker, and not one of them is recommended from any patronizing or altruistic motive * * *. In the interests of plant efficiency men should be treated at least as well as we treat machines. It is for mutual, not one-sided, benefit that the workers' counsel is considered."

"A boy apprenticed to a trade ought to feel confident that he has not been allowed to enter a race in which even before he started he was hopelessly outclassed; he ought to see before him a reasonable certainty of tenure of position, of definite and increasing wages * * * until he has reached a maximum for his trade and locality; he ought to be certain that all those things essential to his health and safety which he can not do himself were being done for him. As to the man, the worker without whom industry would collapse, all conditions ought to be standardized. Drinking water ought to be germ free, life-destroying dust should be sucked away, safeguards should surround moving machinery, work illumination should be adequate, not ruinous to the eyesight. Working hours should be reasonable and without overtime, except in great emergencies; means should be provided for ascertaining directly his needs, his wishes, or listening to his recommendations."

"It is the men closest to their bread and butter who generally have correct instincts as to evils, even if they often flounder as to remedies. It is the flesh that quivers with physical pain, not the brain nor the skeleton. It is on these workers that the duty devolves of bringing up respectable families on a small and precarious income. There is not room for all at the top, even if all were competent to climb; and one of the great problems is to make to-day bearable without taking away the hope of a better to-morrow."

Respectfully submitted.

AUGUST BINDEMAN
(For the Railway Mail Association).

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows down to and including section 6c:

Amend section 6 by adding thereto the following:

"SEC. 6a. That on and after the 1st day of July, 1914, the following positions in the Post Office Department shall be included in the competitive classified service, to wit: First Assistant Postmaster General, Second Assistant Postmaster General, Third Assistant Postmaster General, Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, and postmaster in all post offices of the first, second, and third classes; and after the said 1st day of July, 1914, vacancies in any of said positions shall be filled by the Postmaster General by promotion or transfer of persons already in the service of the Post Office Department. To assist the Postmaster General in making such appointments, the Civil Service Commission shall make and promulgate all necessary rules and regulations therefor. Such rules and regulations shall provide for the transfer of employees in the Railway Mail Service to and from positions in post offices and the transfer of postmaster, assistant postmaster, and clerks from one post office to another and to and from the Post Office Department in Washington: Provided, That no postmaster, assistant postmaster, or other employee of any post office shall, without his consent, be transferred from the post office located in the city or town of his residence.

"SEC. 6b. That from and after the 4th day of March, 1913, appointments to the position of Postmaster General shall be for a term of 10 years, and during such term the Postmaster General shall not be subject to removal except for cause. In addition to the duties now provided by law, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to conduct the affairs of the Post Office Department upon an entirely non-partisan basis, and in making appointments as provided in this act it shall be his duty, as far as possible, to carry out the rules and regulations promulgated by the Civil Service Commission.

"SEC. 6c. That it shall be unlawful for any employee of the Post Office Department to be chairman or a member of any political committee, or to have control or management of any political campaign, or for any postmaster of the first or second class, while holding such position, to engage in the active management or control of any business, trade, or profession that in any way interferes with the full and proper performance of his official duties. Any employee violating the provisions of this section shall be removed from office."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well; the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. NORRIS. I have offered the amendment in the best of faith, and I do not think it is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand the Chair has said that. Of course I do not know just what the idea of the Chair is.

The CHAIRMAN. The idea of the Chair is, he will say to the gentleman, that it is new legislation and changes existing law in an appropriation bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; but the amendment we are considering in the bill is new legislation. The Chair has already held that on another point of order made to-day, which seems to be on all fours with this——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offered this as a separate paragraph to come in after section 6, and therefore he did not offer it as an amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I take it it is an amendment to section 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman if he desires.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not know what I could do except to offer it immediately after the conclusion of the reading of section 6. I think it would be in order in some other place in the bill, if that is the theory of the Chair.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Section 6 is passed. The gentleman can offer his amendment as a separate amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I will add it after section 6. I do not want to take up the time of the House in reading it again. I could offer it as an amendment, perhaps, to several other sections that are in here to which it is germane.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It may be. Suppose the gentleman have it passed upon and see.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment as an amendment to section 6.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the amendment as offered before?

Mr. NORRIS. On the ruling of the Chair I will withdraw the amendment and offer it as an amendment to section 6.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that section 6 is already passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] offers to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection to his request?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not understand that section 6 has been passed.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. Unless the gentleman from Nebraska desires to be heard further, the Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, have we passed section 6, or can we offer an amendment to that section?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment can be offered to section 6.

Mr. DYER. I offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman, to section 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DYER offers the following amendment:

That the following be stricken out, to wit: Beginning with the word "That," line 3, page 30, section 6, and extending to and including the word "thereof," line 22, same page and section, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That there shall be appointed by the President of the United States a commission, to consist of three members, who shall receive as compensation $3,000 per annum for a term of four years, and may be reappointed. The said commission shall be known as the commission on salaries and allowances of postal employees.

"The duties of the said commission shall be to pass on all salaries of postal employees who are in the classified service. When any employee is entitled to an increase of salary by reason of time and length of service, it shall be the duty of the Post Office Department to certify the said employee to the said commission for promotion, and if for cause the department deems it advisable that an employee be not promoted there shall be filed with the said commission a full report of the case and all charges against the said employee, who shall receive a copy of the same and be allowed 10 days to file a written answer or may appear before the commission in person or by attorney, and after such hearing the commission shall decide the case, and such decision shall be final.

"No postal employee of the classified civil service having reached a certain grade and who receives a certain salary shall be reduced to a lower grade except for cause and after a hearing by the commission on salaries and allowances of postal employees.

"When the Post Office Department believes there is a good and sufficient cause for the reduction of salary of a postal employee who is in the classified civil service, it will file with the commission on salaries and allowances its recommendation, with the reasons thereof, and all charges.

"And a copy of the same shall be sent to the employee recommended for reduction, who shall be allowed 10 days to file a written answer to the same, or he may appear before the said commission in person or by attorney to present his case, and after such hearing the commission shall decide, and such decision shall be final."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think it is subject to a point of order. It is substantially the same section as it is now, only with a proviso that there shall be a commission which shall have to do with the promotion and reduction of salaries of clerks in the postal service. It takes them out of the power and out of the influence of the men who are at the head of it, so that no preference will be given that is unjust and unfair, as oftentimes happens. I think, Mr. Chairman, that it is in order and germane to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard?

Mr. MANN. I do not wish to detain the Chair, but it seems to me that an amendment to create a commission is not germane to this proposition to regulate the promotion or discharge of employees.

This is to provide additional employees in the form of a commission, and if you can insert an amendment to create a commission every time you deal with the subject matter of course it is opening the door very wide. The Chair will notice that this is an original proposition in the bill. Of course it is now held to be germane in the bill, although it is legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that although the amendment might be germane it provides for additional legislation, and under the ruling of former Chairmen and Speakers of the House it has been held that in an appropriation bill a paragraph embodying legislation may be perfected by a germane amendment. But this does not permit an amendment to add additional legislation, and the Chair thinks this does add additional legislation, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out section 6.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that section 6 is passed, and it was on that ground that the Chair sustained the point of order to the amendment that I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not base his ruling upon that. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves to strike out section 6.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that there may be at all times just complaints against the administration of the law as to the employees of the Government, but I do not believe that it is advisable to invite the employees of the Government to band together to make assaults upon Congress or upon Members of Congress. I do not believe that it is desirable to permit the employees of the Government to band together for the purpose of threatening a Member of Congress in his district, as would be permitted under the provisions of section 6. We have now the influence of the employees of the Government affecting Congress to a very great extent.

This Government is not created and run for the sole benefit of the employees of the Government. The Government is for the people. The employees work for the Government in the interest of the people. But there are times when one is forced to believe that many of the employees of the Government believe that the Government is maintained for the benefit of its employees. [Applause.]

I do not think that the employees have any difficulty in presenting their grievances to Congress, whether the grievances affect the mass of employees or whether they affect only individual employees. I do not regard any order of the President which forbids me to discuss with an employee matters relating to his employment under the Government, and I never shall. [Applause.] But I do not think there is any need of Congress inviting the employees to band together for the remedying of what they call their "grievances," or to obtain civil pensions, or retirement, or increase of pay, or shortening of hours, or lightening of labor, or a thousand and one other things that are not necessary to be presented in the form of threats to Congress.

There is no occasion for such legislation. There is no demand on the part of the employees for this legislation. The postal employees of the Government are not asking for it. Probably I have as many post-office employees in my district as almost any gentleman on the floor of the House. To a certain extent I believe I enjoy their confidence—their belief, at least, that I will endeavor to deal with them fairly—but they know and I know that they would not benefit any by any threats they might make against me, and maybe they will not do it. I do not know. But they do not want to be invited to do it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman know that the reason they do not ask him for relief when they are distressed and tyrannized over is because if they made that fact known to the department they would lose their positions for doing it?

Mr. MANN. I do not know anything of the kind.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Then the gentleman does not know the fact, for it is true.

Mr. MANN. I know more post-office employees than the gentleman from Tennessee will ever know.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not believe that, either.

Mr. MANN. And I keep in touch with them on matters by which they are affected as closely as does the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, this provision in this bill is necessary at the present time. It is true that the Government employees, as a rule, discharge their duties faithfully. It is true that those Government employees are sworn officers, and it is their duty to uphold the Government. I am well satisfied that there are no employees of this Government, in any branch of it, who are more faithful to their oaths than are the postal employees. [Applause.] The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says that if the President of the United States or the Postmaster General were to make an Executive order that would prevent the employees from talking to him or conferring with him about legislative matters he would ignore the Executive order. But can the postal employee ignore the Executive order?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. At the risk of losing his job.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman from Illinois may do it, and it does not affect him; but when the postal employee violates that Executive order he violates the law of the United States and places himself in a position of antagonism to those who are in authority over him.

This is the order about which the people complain and about which the postal employees complain; and if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has never heard of any complaints from the postal employees it is proof positive that he is not in touch with them. [Applause.]

The following is the Executive order to which I refer:

It is hereby ordered that no bureau officer, division chief, or subordinate in any department of the Government, and no officer of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps stationed in Washington, shall apply to either House of Congress, or to any committee of either House of Congress, or to any Member of Congress, for legislation or for appropriations or for congressional action of any kind except with the consent and knowledge of the head of the department.

And now observe—

Nor shall any such person respond to any request for information from either House of Congress or any committee of either House of Congress, or any Member of Congress, excepting through or as authorized by the head of the department.

This Executive order is signed by William H. Taft. What is the effect of that order? That no postal employee can speak to a Member of Congress about anything affecting his duty unless he has first approached his chief and asked permission to speak to the Member of Congress, and in addition to that he must state to the head of the department what it is he wishes to confer about when he asks to confer with the Member of Congress.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is not that the same order which Mr. Roosevelt issued during his term as President?

Mr. LLOYD. It is not exactly the same order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. A similar order.

Mr. LLOYD. I will insert the other order in my remarks in order that both may be seen:

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S ORDER.

All officers and employees of the United States of every description, serving in or under any of the executive departments or independent Government establishments, and whether so serving in or out of Washington, are hereby forbidden, either directly or indirectly, individually or through associations, to solicit an increase of pay or to influence or attempt to influence in their own interest any other legislation whatever, either before Congress or its committees, or in any way save through the heads of the departments or independent Government establishments in or under which they serve, on penalty of dismissal from the Government service.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Both President Taft and President Roosevelt are likewise offending, though the form of the Executive orders are slightly different.

It is claimed that President Taft has recently made an order which corrects the evil complained of and for which the pending provision in the Post Office appropriation bill is intended to afford a remedy. The Executive order which he promulgated a short time since is in the following words:

It is hereby ordered that petitions or other communications regarding public business addressed to the Congress or either House or any committee or member thereof by officers or employees in the civil service of the United States shall be transmitted through the heads of their respective departments or offices, who shall forward them without delay with such comment as they may deem requisite in the public interest. Officers and employees are strictly prohibited, either directly or indirectly, from attempting to secure legislation or to influence pending legislation, except in the manner above prescribed.

WILLIAM H. TAFT.

It will be observed from a careful reading of the new order that it in nowise remedies the evil of which special complaint is made, inasmuch as the employee is not permitted to communicate with any Member of Congress, any committee of Congress, or the Congress itself, without making the communication through the head of the department; and this order does not revoke the former orders to which reference has been made.

If the pending bill is enacted into law, then the department employee will not be subject to Executive orders, so far as this particular provision is concerned.

It was declared long ago by those who preceded us that all men should be free and equal, and the pledge was made that this freedom should be insured to the people of the Colonies and their posterity. One of the rights especially guaranteed under the Constitution of the United States is the freedom of speech. In this Republic the people control—the idea was that the people should rule and the supreme authority in government should be the people. Instead of the Government asserting itself through superior officers to inferior officers, officials should recognize that they should be obedient to the law of the people, and the people, as such, through their representatives, should have the right to inquire as to any of the conditions of government and the method of conducting any line of departmental business and the doings of those who happen to be employed in official place. Every man occupying office in the United States should feel that his employer is the people and that his obligation is to them, and they have the right to know everything pertaining to the Government's business. These Executive orders are in direct conflict with this idea of the rule of the people.

If no Government employee is permitted to speak, excepting through his department chiefs, and the department chief through the Cabinet officer, then this is an aristocratic Government, dominated completely by the official family of the President. If the principle enunciated in these Executive orders is to be carried to the extreme, then there is no possible way of obtaining information excepting through the Cabinet officers, and if these officials desire to withhold information and suppress the truth or to conceal their official acts it is within their power to do so. This Government will be more popular when its official proceedings are an open book and the conduct of its officials continuously subject to scrutiny and investigation by the people at any time and in any manner the people elect.

I do not mean to advocate that the person in the employ of the Government should not be in any sense under the direction of an overseer who, for the time being, is to give directions to the employee as to the official work he is to perform; but I do say that such overseer has no right, under the principles which should prevail in a free Government, to direct that the employee under him shall make no expression with reference to the official's acts except through the overseer. This course leads to distrust, dissatisfaction, to charges of wrongdoing, and breeds discontent among the people. The object of this proposed law is to overcome as far as possible amongst postal employees the secrecy which is now imposed upon them in regard to the acts of their officials and to give such employees the opportunity to confer with their representatives, or the people through their representatives, to the end that such information as is desired may be obtained through them.

The Post Office Department is the people's branch of the Government. Every person connected with it should feel that in addition to his duty as a patriotic citizen he is under obligation by reason of the oath he has taken to uphold the Government, maintain its integrity, and do all in his power to make successful every phase of postal duty. If the Post Office Department is a failure the Government is to that extent a failure. If any branch of the postal service becomes inefficient the whole service is affected by it.

I believe there is no more faithful body of Government employees than the postal officials. They need encouragement and not discouragement. They should be safeguarded in every possible way and everything should be done by law or administration to perfect the postal system and make it more efficient. At present it is the best found in any country, and I rejoice in this fact and hope that what has been done in recent times to breed discontent amongst postal employees may soon be undone, and that there may come a unity in action and a harmony in association which will have the effect of making as nearly perfect as may be this important branch of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think it is conceded that every citizen of the United States, whether he be a Government employee or not, should have the right of petition; and I do not believe that the post-office employees have ever felt that they were restricted from the right of petition. At least they never have felt that way when they wanted to petition me, for I have been getting anywhere from 10 to 50 letters a day from post-office employees and other Government employees during all of my public service, and I have never failed to respond to any petition which they have made.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. How does the gentleman interpret the Executive orders of Theodore Roosevelt and of William Howard Taft?

Mr. MADDEN. I am not trying to interpret them. I am in favor of this legislation.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. But you are not in favor of these Executive orders?

Mr. MADDEN. I am not trying to interpret the order, but I say that every citizen should have the right to petition.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MADDEN. I only have a minute.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It is but a short question.

Mr. MADDEN. My time is limited. I am in favor of giving the broadest latitude to every man, whether he is a Government employee or not, and hence I was in favor of this legislation as a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and unhesitatingly helped report it. I think the report of the committee was unanimous on that subject. The members of the committee felt that if there was any possibility or chance of the employees of the Government being discharged because of their having presented their case, if they had a grievance, to a Member of Congress, that that possible chance ought to be obliterated.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does not my colleague know that post-office employees have been demoted and discharged on account of having violated this order?

Mr. MADDEN. No, I do not know it; and I do not presume that the gentleman knows it. I presume that employees have been demoted and their pay reduced, but what for I do not know.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do know, and I can furnish the gentleman the information.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to say to my colleague that he is not any more favorable to the consideration of questions that favorably affect the post-office employees than I am, and any insinuation that he may make that he is more favorable to the employees in the Post Office Department than anybody else is uncalled for. There is no need for him to criticize my action.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have made no such insinuations or criticisms.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no necessity for any question about it at all.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The RECORD will show my position.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say again that every proper opportunity should be given to a citizen of the United States, whether he be in the Government service or not, to present his case to the governing authorities in order that any grievance that he may have may be remedied.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I want the floor mainly for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Illinois a question that I endeavored to ask him a little while ago.

Mr. MADDEN. All right.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman says that he has received from 10 to 50 letters a day from Government and postal employees, which he has never failed to answer. That does not quite cover the point. What I want to know is if invariably the writers did not ask him to preserve their identity and not make it known?

Mr. MADDEN. Never; not in a single instance.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Then all I can say is that the gentleman's experience has been materially different from mine; that I have rarely been consulted or written to by postal employees but what they have asked me to preserve secrecy and not give them away for fear they would incur dismissal for violating this gag rule.

Mr. MADDEN. Perhaps they did not have as much confidence in the gentleman as they have in me.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to say that I do not believe in the denatured Americanism that results from these Executive gag orders. [Applause.] I think the sacred rights of American citizenship too high a price to pay for any job, even under Uncle Sam. [Applause.] And I sincerely hope that the House will emphatically and overwhelmingly sustain the action of the committee in this matter, reestablishing the full citizenship rights of Government employees, and so put the attitude of Congress on this question forever beyond dispute. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. I am heartily in favor of this section myself, and I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to say that this section had the unanimous support of the entire membership of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I would like to ask the gentleman if that is the fact?

Mr. MADDEN. Why, Mr. Chairman, everything in the bill was unanimously reported by the committee.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in order to properly understand the matter that is contained in this particular section, it seems to me that it would be proper at this time to read the two orders that have been issued by the former President of the United States and the present President of the United States.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. DYER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he considers that there is any politics in this bill that we are now considering?

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Oh, I do not think there is any politics in it at all, but what I do believe is that it is absolutely necessary that the employees of the United States Government be relieved from the gag rule that has been imposed upon them year after year. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I only rise for the purpose of inserting in the RECORD at this time these two particular orders.

Mr. DYER. I would like to say to the gentleman that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] has already said that he was going to insert them in the RECORD in his remarks, so that they are already in.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that these tyrannous rules, for the benefit of the people of the United States, can not be inserted too often. This is the Roosevelt resolution:

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S ORDER.

All officers and employees of the United States of every description, serving in or under any of the executive departments or independent Government establishments, and whether so serving in or out of Washington, are hereby forbidden, either directly or indirectly, individually or through associations, to solicit an increase of pay or to influence or attempt to influence in their own interest any other legislation whatever, either before Congress or its committees, or in any way save through the heads of the departments or independent Government establishments in or under which they serve, on penalty of dismissal from the Government service.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

The following is the Taft order:

PRESIDENT TAFT'S ORDER.

It is hereby ordered that no bureau, office, or division chief, or subordinate in any department of the Government, and no officer of the Army or Navy or Marine Corps stationed in Washington, shall apply to either House of Congress, or to any committee of either House of Congress, or to any Member of Congress, for legislation, or for appropriations, or for congressional action of any kind, except with the consent and knowledge of the head of the department; nor shall any such person respond to any request for information from either House of Congress, or any committee of either House of Congress, or any Member of Congress, except through, or as authorized by, the head of his department.

WILLIAM H. TAFT.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, what is the gentleman reading from—his own speech?

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. I am reading from the RECORD of April 9, 1912.

Mr. MANN. From the gentleman's own speech?

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Of course it is, and I think it is generally agreed that it was a very good speech. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the provision in the bill as reported by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. The Executive order to which reference has been made is, in my judgment, a clear invasion of the rights of citizens. Whether the citizen holds office under the Government or not, his right to petition for a redress of grievances should not, and, constitutionally speaking, can not be interfered with. I do not desire to detain the committee further than to refer to the protest which I entered against the Executive order as far back as March 13, 1902. Speaking then to matters affecting the post office and postal employees, I said, and I desire to repeat my words now, for they are applicable and timely:

I was astonished at the recent Executive order forbidding carriers, as well as other Government employees, from petitioning or approaching Members of Congress with a view to having their salaries or compensation increased. For one, I believe that whether in Government employ or in the service of private concerns a citizen has an absolute constitutional right to petition or request a Member of Congress for an increase of his pay, provided he does it in a respectful manner.

The right to petition the Government for a redress of grievances is the prerogative of every American citizen under the Constitution of the land. And this prerogative exists whether the citizen holds office or not, or whether or no he draws pay from the Public Treasury. In my opinion, the letter carrier, or any other Government employee, has the same unlimited, untrammeled, unfettered right to respectfully petition Congress for the betterment of his condition as any other man in the land; and the Executive order, in my judgment, constitutes an unjustifiable abridgment of and an invasion upon the constitutional right of the citizen.

That, I think, is the judgment of every fair-minded man, it is in consonance with justice and fair play, and therefore I am heartily in favor of the provision as it is incorporated in the bill as reported. [Applause.]

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, provisions are incorporated in the pending Post Office appropriation bill to better the working conditions of the postal employees. It is my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to discuss these provisions which are of genuine merit. Ever since coming to Congress I have taken an interest in the welfare of these employees. I have been especially interested in attempting to secure the enactment of some legislation that will establish a statutory limitation to the hours of post-office clerks. Because of my interest in this cause I have come in contact with many of the postal employees, and have come to understand some of the deplorable conditions which have surrounded them.

PROPOSED EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. Chairman, it is most gratifying to me, and I am sure this sentiment is generally shared by the Members of this House, to find that the Post Office Committee has incorporated in this appropriation bill a provision to establish a legal eight-hour day for post-office clerks and letter carriers. The Post Office Committee is to be congratulated for having made a favorable report upon this legislation. To enact this legislation is but to do simple justice to this faithful army of postal employees, an act of justice which has been too long delayed. I am in hearty sympathy with every feature of this proposed eight-hour legislation. Eight hours has come to be recognized as the measure of a day's labor by this Government in dealing with its employees. An employee will more efficiently discharge his duties when working under an eight-hour law than when compelled to exhaust his energies by working in excess of that period. The Post Office Department has no right to demand more than eight hours of its employees. It is an astonishing fact that post-office clerks have never enjoyed the protection of any legislation whatever to limit their hours of labor. I know from personal investigation, and from information derived from my attendance at some of the conventions of the United National Association of Post Office Clerks that the clerks have frequently been compelled to be actually on duty from 10 to 12 hours a day. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I know of instances where they have been compelled to labor for more than 12 hours a day. It is unfortunate that the public and the Congress has not had a better understanding of the nature of the duties performed by these clerks. They are away from the eyes of the public, and, therefore, their duties have not been understood.

It is no exaggeration to say that the great majority of the clerks work at night. This is because the heavy mails arrive at the post office after the close of the day in the business world.

Everybody must conceive that the strain of working at night under artificial light is far greater than the strain involved in working under natural conditions in the daytime.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that it will not be long after this legislation is enacted when a further provision will be made to make seven hours of night work the equivalent of eight hours of daywork. In the English postal service seven hours of night work has long been recognized as the equivalent of eight hours of daywork. The action of the English Government in making this distinction resulted from an investigation as to the relative effect upon the employees of night and day work. Under the provisions of this proposed legislation it would be possible, Mr. Chairman, for the department to establish by regulation that seven hours of night work could be the equal of eight hours of daywork. I am told that the department favors such a recognition of the difference involved between night and day work.

But, Mr. Chairman, the department has also recognized the justice of an eight-hour day, but has failed to maintain such schedules, and only legislation can be depended upon to insure that the will of this body will be carried out.

It is not generally understood that a great majority of these clerks must master difficult "schemes" of mail distribution that they may promptly and efficiently distribute the mail. These "schemes" embrace anywhere from 1,500 post offices to 5,000 or more post offices in a given State. Often it is necessary for a distributing clerk to master the schemes of more than one State. The clerk must know in which county the post office is located. He must know which particular railway postal line will take the letter to that post office. He must know the particular train on that particular run. He must know at different hours of the day and night which train, over which road, will make the quickest connection, for it must be remembered there are many different trains over many different roads. This perfection of knowledge requires a never-ending study, because conditions as to schedules of trains, establishment of new offices, and the discontinuance of other offices are constantly changing. For all of the hours of systematic studying at home, with sample distribution case, and thousands of cards which the clerk must write representing the letters that he must stow in his daily employment—for all this the clerk receives absolutely no consideration whatever.

The financial responsibilities of the clerks employed in the money-order department, in the registry department, and in the sale of stamps require a high order of intelligence. It is not generally understood that these employees holding positions of financial responsibility are compelled to make good all losses which are bound to occur from time to time because of the multiplicity of transactions.

This proposed legislation further provides that the 8 hours of work for letter carriers and post-office clerks shall be worked within a period of 10 hours. Mr. Chairman, this is a wise provision, and a provision that is a tribute to the reasonableness of these employees in their demand. Naturally when an eight-hour day is spoken of it creates the impression that the eight hours represents a continuous period of service with the exception of a brief interval for luncheon. But in the postal service the words "eight hours" have meant something entirely different.

Even where 8-hour schedules for clerks and carriers were supposed to prevail, the 8 hours were stretched out over a period of from 10 hours to 12 or 13 hours a day. It is the custom to compel these employees to officially register off duty for periods of an hour or more at different times during the day. Such a system, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe to exist anywhere in the business world or in any other branch of the Government service.

This business of compelling a carrier or clerk to report three or four times a day is a direct injustice. To all intents and purposes the employees might as well be kept steadily at work, for the time that they are off duty is so broken up as to be utterly useless to them. To call such a system an eight-hour day is a parody on the proposition.

The Post Office Department seems to oppose this legislation on the ground that the volume of mails fluctuate greatly from month to month or from day to day. Why, Mr. Chairman, where is there a business that does not have its light days and its heavy days, its dull season and its busy season? But we do not hear of a private employer taking advantage of every dull hour by compelling his employees to register out and walk around the block that the employer might gain that much time; not at all. The private employer knows that his employees will rise to the emergency of the busier period with increased energy. The clerks and carriers in asking for an 8-hour day covering a period of 10 hours, instead of asking for 8 hours covering a period of 9, show their zeal for the service and a desire to contribute in every way that which is reasonable to the efficiency of the service.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is not such a great change in the volume of mail after all. The reports of the department show that for eight months of the year the postal receipts are very uniform. There is no other way to judge of the volume of mail than as the volume may be indicated in the amount of the gross receipts. The department seems to contend that it is fair to work the employees more than eight hours during the heavier season, because they allege that the clerks do not average as much as eight hours in the summer months. Mr. Chairman, this contention is hardly borne out by an investigation of the facts. It is true that there are two months of the year when the volume of mail is subnormal, but these two months are the midsummer months of July and August, when most people relax from the strain of the busy winter season, but there is no relaxation for the clerks and carriers in these two months. It is during these two months of July and August that the more than 32,000 clerks employed in the first and second class post offices of the country take their annual vacation of 15 days. Scarcely any provision is made to provide substitutes for the clerks who are on their annual leaves, with the result that the clerks remaining on duty must also discharge the duties of their fellow clerks who are on vacation. The result is that it very frequently happens that the clerks work even longer hours in the most heated term of the summer than they do in the normal period of eight months of the year. The letter carriers are no better off than the clerks in this respect. As a result of the economy program of the department, the letter carriers are now compelled to not only cover their own routes in the summer-vacation period, but must also cover all, or at least a portion, of the route of their fellow carriers who are on vacation. We can readily see how such a system of false economy impairs the efficiency of the public service and how such a system taxes the carrier to the very limit of human endurance.

Mr. Chairman, the provision in the legislation that in cases of emergency the letter carriers and post-office clerks may be required to work in excess of eight hours, and that they shall be compensated for such extra service according to their salaries, is a most essential feature. I believe it is pretty generally understood that the courts have held that no eight-hour legislation is effective unless a penalty is provided for work performed in excess of the eight hours.

I find in the hearings before the Post Office Committee a copy of a letter addressed to the chairman of the Senate Post Office Committee by the Postmaster General stating the objections of the department to this proposed eight-hour legislation.

In that letter the department states, in reference to this particular section providing for extra compensation for time in excess of eight hours:

> There are many who will find in this opportunity to obtain additional compensation for overtime. Such inducement for loitering and wasting time that the additional cost of the service would be very much.

Mr. Chairman, this statement is a most unfortunate and unconfirmed reflection on the honesty and character of this great army of more than 60,000 letter carriers and post-office clerks. These employees have demonstrated their faithfulness to the service just as keenly as have their superiors, who, after all, are themselves only the employees of the same public we are all trying to serve. These employees are only seeking to have established a working day of reasonable length, and, as I have said earlier in my remarks, they have demonstrated their willingness to give the service every advantage by asking that the proposed 8-hour tour of duty may be extended over a period of 10 hours, rather than 9 hours. If no provision was contained in this legislation which the Post Office Committee has inserted in this bill to make it possible that these employees might work in excess of 8 hours, the criticism might well be made that the employees were acting without regard to the emergencies that might arise within the service.

The argument that this proposed 8-hour legislation will be very expensive to the Government seems to me to be wholly without weight. I find on another page of the hearings before the Post Office Committee a statement by the First Assistant Postmaster General as follows:

> About 85 per cent of the carriers and clerks complete their tour of duty within 10 hours, and probably 95 per cent within 11 hours, but in some instances their 8-hour tours of duty extend over 12 or 13 hours, I presume.

This official statement of the department disposes of the specter that a great expense is involved. But, Mr. Chairman, even if there should be a considerable expense involved, because under the operation of this proposed legislation it would become necessary to pay the employees extra pay for time worked in excess of 8 hours or to employ an additional force so that the work might be accomplished within 8 hours, who is there that can object to such an expense so justly incurred? This is a great Government, and it owes it to itself to deal justly and fairly with its own employees that a decent example may be set to private employers.

Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that the people of the country labor under the impression that the letter carriers have an 8-hour day. It is true that away back in 1888 Congress did enact an 8-hour day for letter carriers and provided that they should be paid extra if they worked more than 8 hours. It was necessary to go to court and secure a decision from the highest court in the land to the effect that if the carriers worked more than 8 hours they would have to be paid for it before the department attempted to put their 8-hour law into operation. This decision of the Supreme Court, as to the necessity of paying the carriers for their overtime, was handed down, I believe, in 1895, and it was not until then that the department issued orders that the schedules of letter carriers should be so arranged that they could not work more than 8 hours a day. Mr. Chairman, the fact that the department could arrange these schedules so that from 1895 to 1901 the carriers were not permitted to work more than 8 hours, and yet serve the public well and efficiently, is the best reason for entertaining the belief that the officials of the department can again arrange the schedules of the clerks and carriers under this proposed legislation so that the employees will not be permitted to work more than 8 hours per day. I know that the carriers are very much dissatisfied with the conditions under which they labor now, and justly so. Some 10 years ago a provision was incorporated in one of the appropriation bills providing that letter carriers might be required to work as nearly as practicable only 8 hours on each working day, but not in any event exceeding 48 hours during the 6 working days of the week. This proviso in the appropriation bill made no provision for the payment to the letter carriers for any time that he works in excess of 48 hours per week. The result was, of course, that the letter carrier virtually found himself without any legal protection as to his hours of labor, because he could be compelled to work in excess of the 48 hours per week and could receive no compensation therefor. The first year following the enactment of this provision this 48-hour per week law for the letter carriers was put into effect with results that were disastrous to the service and to the letter carriers as well.

An opinion from the legal branch of the Post Office Department was to the effect that this 48-hour per week proviso in the appropriation bill automatically expired with the end of the year for which the appropriation was made. Under orders from the department, commencing in 1901, I believe, the carriers then returned to work under the conditions of their old eight-hour law of 1888. I am advised that in 1910 the department caused a suit to be brought in the Court of Claims to determine if this 48-hour proviso in the appropriation bill of 1901 superseded the letter carriers 8-hour act of 1888, and the decision of the Court of Claims was to the effect that the 48-hour per week proviso is in force and does supersede the original 8-hour act of 1888. Since this decision of the Court of Claims in 1910, the carriers have been working under this 48-hour provision. Under its operation, many abuses have grown up. Complaints from the public as to the character of service they receive have multiplied. It is not generally known that the letter carrier is now compelled to stretch his 8 hours of daily duty over a period of 12 hours or more. These men frequently report for duty as early as 6 o'clock in the morning, and do not definitely leave the post office for home until 6 in the evening. Such conditions demand the enactment of such legislation as is contained in this bill, which will give a definite status to the hours of labor of these employees.

ANTIGAG PROVISION.

Mr. Chairman, there is another important provision in this bill known as the antigag provision.

No greater danger to a free government can be suggested than to attempt to deny to any of the people the right of free speech and the right to petition Congress. It is humiliating that in this day of progressive government the Congress should find it necessary to enact legislation to give back to some of our citizens the right which was guaranteed to them under the Constitution. The provision incorporated in this appropriation bill by the Post Office Committee, to the effect that the Post Office employees shall have the right to petition Congress or any Member of Congress for a redress of grievances; that no employee of the civil service shall be removed from the service without having been furnished with a copy of the charges on which the order for his removal is based and given an opportunity to make a written defense and to submit affidavits in support of his defense, is but an act of elemental justice.

Again, the committee is to be congratulated for having brought this proposed legislation before this body. No better evidence of the responsiveness of Congress to the will of the people could be found than in the enactment of this legislation.

This is a representative Government and woe unto the Nation when the time comes when the people are deprived of the right of appeal to their Representatives in Congress.

The vast army of Government employees have signed no agreement upon entering the service of the Government to give up the boasted liberty of the American citizens.

There has been growing an intolerable spirit of bureaucracy in the official circles of the Government which must be overcome at all hazards.

The spirit of the department head that he has been constituted the sole protector of the employees who come under his jurisdiction must be rebuked.

It is for Congress to say what treatment this Government shall accord its employees, and it is for the executive branch of this Government to faithfully carry out the intention of Congress.

It is an intolerable condition that the executive branch of the Government shall say to the Congress who shall and who shall not have the right of appeal to it.

Yet, that it the condition that has existed by virtue of the Executive order, which has properly come to be called the gag order, that forbids the employees either individually or through associations, directly or indirectly, to appeal to Congress or to any Member thereof for a redress of their grievances.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that every Member of this body has independence enough to meet the employees of this Government, listen to their grievances, and say yes or no to their requests, according to their belief or disbelief in the presentation.

To bar the employees and the officers of the associations of employees from appealing direct to Congress, invites the suggestion that the department heads do not want Congress to know what the real conditions are.

Such an assumption of arrogance must be frowned upon.

The protection afforded the civil service employees in this section of the appropriation bill will stay the hand of many an official executioner who, for personal reasons or for political reasons, would take the head of a civil service employee.

The Members of this body have no more reason to be alarmed about the annoyance which may come to them from the appeals of the Government employees than from the appeals of any other class of their constituents, and I do not believe the Members of this body are at all anxious to avoid any of their responsibilities.

The proposed promotion of 75 per cent of the clerks and carriers from $1,100 to $1,200 in first-class offices, and from $1,000 to $1,100 in second-class offices, is a very fair and deserving one.

The act making appropriations for the postal service for the year ending June 30, 1908, contained a provision for the classification of the salaries of post-office clerks employed at first and second class post offices and letter carriers in the City Delivery Service. The salaries are classified by this act as follows: First grade, salary $600; second grade, salary $800; third grade, salary $900; fourth grade, salary $1,000; fifth grade, salary $1,100; sixth grade, salary $1,200.

Mr. Chairman, this classification act further provided that clerks and carriers at first-class offices shall be promoted successively to the fifth grade, and clerks and carriers in second-class offices shall be promoted successively to the fourth grade.

It was provided that all promotions under this act could only be made upon evidence satisfactory to the Post Office Department of the efficiency and faithfulness of the employees during the preceding year. In this classification act Congress established a sixth, or $1,200, grade for clerks and carriers in first-class offices, but unfortunately did not exactly specify how the clerks and carriers should be promoted to this grade. In the same manner Congress established a fifth, or $1,100, grade, and a sixth, or $1,200, grade for clerks and carriers at second-class offices, and did not specify how the employees might be promoted to these grades.

In the annual Post Office appropriation bill, for the year ended June 30, 1909, Congress gave a clear interpretation of the intention of the classification act, at least in so far as promotions at first-class offices are concerned, by appropriating for the promotion of 100 per cent of the clerks and carriers who might be eligible on account of efficient services and necessary length of service to the sixth, or $1,200, grade.

In the act making appropriations for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1910, Congress appropriated a sufficient sum for the promotion of 50 per cent of the clerks and carriers in second-class offices from the fourth to the fifth grade, or from $1,000 to $1,100. This was the first legislation to promote these employees above $1,000.

In the same act, however, Congress, for some unaccountable reason, did not follow the precedent of the preceding year and only appropriated a sufficient sum for the promotion of 50 per cent of the clerks and carriers in first-class offices from the fifth to the sixth grade, or from $1,100 to $1,200. Since that time Congress each year has only been appropriating for the promotion of 50 per cent of the clerks and carriers in first-class offices from $1,100 to $1,200 and in second-class offices from $1,000 to $1,100. The fact that only one-half of the employees in these grades could be promoted each year, regardless of their efficiency, has given rise to great dissatisfaction and, as might be expected where an arbitrary limit of 50 per cent of those eligible for promotion has been fixed, many injustices are committed in selecting those who shall be promoted.

In each post office throughout the country the clerks and carriers who are eligible for promotion in these particular grades are dependent upon the recommendation of their postmaster. Naturally under such a system discrimination is bound to be practiced, and it has been practiced; and favoritism is bound to be shown, and it has been shown. As an instance of the power of interpretation now invested with the department in these particular grades as to promotions it may be cited that the department has ruled that the 50 per cent provision governing these promotions applies to the individual post office rather than to the employees of the service as a whole.

As a result of this ruling a clerk or carrier who happened to be in the unfortunate position of being the only employee eligible for promotion in either of these particular grades was denied promotion by the department, regardless of the most extraordinary efficiency, because of the contention of the department that to promote this one eligible employee would be to promote more than 50 per cent of those eligible in that particular office. In like manner, if there happened to be three employees eligible for promotion the department would only sanction the promotion of one. If there happened to be five employees the department would only sanction the promotion of two. In every instance only the minor fraction was recognized in these grades when it came to promotions.

The really correct way to remedy this condition is to amend the salary-classification law of the clerks and carriers so as to make promotion to the maximum grades in first and second class offices contingent only upon the established efficiency of the employee, in just the same manner as promotions are now regulated in all of the other grades. While the Post Office Committee has not seen fit at this time to recommend such an amendment to the classification law, the Post Office Committee has made provision for the promotion of 75 per cent of the clerks and carriers in first-class offices from the $1,100 to the $1,200 grade and for the promotion of 75 per cent of the clerks and carriers in second-class offices from the $1,000 to the $1,100 grade, and the committee deserves great credit therefor.

No doubt it was the intention of the Post Office Committee in providing for the promotion of 25 per cent more of the clerks and carriers in these particular grades than heretofore to serve notice on the Post Office Department that it is the intention of Congress that these promotions are to be made upon the basis of the efficiency of the employees in these grades throughout the entire service, and not on the basis of any particular office. It is my belief that a more intelligent and rational system can be applied in disbursing these promotions than the system which has been in operation and which has been responsible for so much dissatisfaction and discrimination.

Another indication of injustices which have existed in the operation of the salary law in its application to the clerks can be found in the attitude of the department in preventing the promotion of certain of the clerks to the maximum grades because they were not engaged in a particular kind of post-office work. Prior to the passage of the classification act, in March, 1907, post-office clerks were known under different designations, such as "money-order clerks," "registry clerks," "distributers," "stamp clerks," and so forth. As a result of the use of these different designations there was much confusion of administration. Congress, in enacting the classification law, which was contained in the appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, sought to eliminate this confusion by using only the term "post-office clerk." It was clearly the intention of Congress that all clerks, wherever employed, were eligible for promotion to the maximum grade if they acquired a satisfactory degree of efficiency in the work in which they were engaged.

The attitude of the department in assuming to itself the right to read into the classification act a construction never intended by Congress is indefensible. To deny promotion to clerks with the highest efficiency ratings in their respective offices because they may be employed as money-order clerks, registry clerks, stamp clerks, general-delivery clerks, "nixie" clerks, and so forth is a most serious discrimination against these clerks and one which Congress never intended.

Just as long as it remains possible to practice discrimination in promotions in these particular grades through failure to appropriate a sufficient sum for the promotion of all of the efficient employees, then just that long will we witness a continuance of the obnoxious "speed-up" system which is now being practiced. Congress has set its standard of disapproval upon the so-called Taylor shop system of efficiency because Congress did not believe it was real efficiency to crowd an employee to such a speed in his work that he must soon become a physical wreck. It is exactly the principle of the Taylor system that is being put into effect in our post offices, and unless the employees are relieved from its harassing influences we will witness the breaking down of many competent and efficient postal employees.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the section and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that by providing that it be closed now.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Very well, Mr. Chairman; I will so modify my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that all debate on the section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to strike out the section.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 1, noes 132.

So the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FLOOD of Virginia having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

S. 4623. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5045. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5194. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such sodiers and sailors;

S. 5670. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. J. Res. 102. Joint resolution relative to the rebuilding of certain levees on the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5624) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BURNHAM, Mr. BRADLEY, and Mr. POMERENE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 22043. An act to authorize additional aids to navigation in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to furnish to the House of Representatives, in compliance with its request, a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 2224) to amend an act to regulate the height of buildings in the District of Columbia, approved June 1, 1910.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That after June 30, 1912, the Postmaster General may appoint railway postal clerks in such manner and of such respective grades and salaries as may be provided for in the annual appropriation acts for the service of the Post Office Department, for the purpose of sorting and distributing the mail in railway post offices, railway post-office terminals and transfer offices, and for service in the offices of division superintendents and chief clerks, and as transfer clerks and such other services as may pertain to the Railway Mail Service. Such clerks shall be designated as railway postal clerks and shall be divided into the following grades, with corresponding salaries per annum not exceeding the following rates:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I simply want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether he has any further taken into consideration the suggestion I made the other day that this reclassification of the Railway Mail Service seems to be in conflict with that part of the bill which appropriates for the clerks in the Railway Mail Service, and whether any amendment could be offered which would make the appropriation carried in the bill available under this reclassification?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will be candid with the gentleman about that. The purpose is to get the law. It will take perhaps a year or more to make the reclassification. There is no necessity for an appropriation until next year.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman could hardly be correct about that. This section authorizes the reclassification to commence with the beginning of the next fiscal year, and it might readily happen that in some one class of the reclassification there would be a greater or less number at a fixed salary than the number carried in the appropriating part of the bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Possibly so.

Mr. MANN. It must be so, if there is any change made.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will inform the gentleman that the committee acted on the advice of the department in this matter.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be perfectly feasible to make the appropriation which has already preceded this portion of the bill available for the reclassification provided by this section?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That might be true. That could be done. There is no question about that, but the necessity for its being done does not exist, in view of the fact that the department does not think it can make a reclassification before the next appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Well, my information is that the department does not expect to make this classification on June 30, 1913, at all; that they expect to put into effect this reclassification during the next fiscal year.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. I call the gentleman's attention to this fact: This is only a proposed law; it is not a law yet; and the Post Office Committee did not feel they were warranted in bringing in an appropriation to carry out something that has not yet become a law.

Mr. MANN. I have not suggested changing the appropriation, but it is a very simple proposition here to provide that the money appropriated under this act for railway mail clerks shall be available under this classification as it is put in operation.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Unquestionably that is true; but the department did not think it was necessary, and therefore it is not put in the bill.

Mr. FINLEY. And I will say, further, my understanding is that is satisfactory to the parties interested.

Mr. MANN. I will say, whether there is a presidential order on the subject or not, I have conferred with gentlemen who are interested in the Railway Mail Service, and if I did not think this bill had to go through another body where it would be perfected I should offer an amendment to it now.

Mr. FINLEY. I think I know as much—possibly a little more—than the gentleman from Illinois on the question of what the postal clerks wish.

Mr. MANN. Why, I think possibly the gentleman knows more about the Post Office Department than I do. I am not perfect and do not know all about that or anything else.

Mr. FINLEY. I did not make that statement.

Mr. MANN. Well, I make the statement that this bill will not become a law in this shape. It will be changed by a body that is not as negligent as the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

After June 30, 1913, clerks in class A shall be promoted successively to grade 3, clerks in class B shall be promoted successively to grade 4, and clerks in class C shall be promoted successively to grade 5, at the beginning of the quarter following the expiration of a year's satisfactory service in the next lower grade. Promotions above these grades within the maximum grades of the classification may be made in the discretion of the Postmaster General for meritorious service. No promotion shall be made except upon evidence satisfactory to the Post Office Department of the efficiency and faithfulness of the employee during the preceding year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, line 7, after the word "and," strike out the word "thirteen" and insert the word "twelve."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it is proposed by this amendment to give these clerks as classified something substantial in this year—1912. If it is proposed to increase their pay, as indicated by the bill, there is no reason why the increase should be held up for one year. Let it begin now—in the year 1912. To hold out the year 1913 carries the promise of relief beyond the power of the present Congress. This Congress can raise these salaries now, and can fix the status of these clerks at once. After this bill is passed it will be in the hands of another Congress. Now, if we propose to do this thing in a substantial way for the railway clerks, do it so that it will go into effect while we have the power to do it.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, this matter was considered, and to carry this amendment means to place in the bill an additional appropriation necessary to carry it out. Now, if the committee is prepared to do that, why I have no particular objection, but the Post Office Committee fixed this matter in this way after a full consideration. We went over this matter with the Post Office officials and then we went over it with those who are vitally interested in this section of the bill, and it was satisfactory——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman knows if we pass the bill in its present form it will have no effect upon a succeeding Congress.

Mr. FINLEY. But the gentleman is mistaken. After June 30, 1913, the classification is obligatory, it is mandatory, so the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not think it would be if the next Congress should decide not to act. We have the power to do it now at this session of Congress, and we ought to do it.

Mr. FINLEY. The next Congress can repeal any act it sees fit.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It seems to me that instead of holding out a promise for the future it might as well be made good at the present time. This is a worthy class of employees. These are men to whom everybody wants to do exact justice.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman that the railway mail clerks desire to have the law fixed and certain, and he knows that the classification could not be put into effect in a few months. It will take time to work it out.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I submit the matter. We have it up now, and it seems to me better to do it now while we have the power.

Mr. FINLEY. We have the power to fix the law, but the time necessary to effect the classification will take months. The committee considered it very seriously and fixed it to the satisfaction of everybody concerned.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose it should be found, in view of the appropriation bills that are coming in, and in view of the fact that we may not be able to provide next year for all of the things contemplated by existing bills, that we can not then give these clerks this increase?

Mr. FINLEY. Unquestionably the next appropriation bill will have to carry the increased appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 70.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That hereafter postage shall be paid on matter of the fourth class at the rate of 12 cents per pound, except as herein provided.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is the beginning of the parcel-post section which covers a number of paragraphs, and I would like to see whether we can have some understanding with reference to the reading and consideration of it and the amendment which will be offered.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that we propose to offer a committee substitute to section 8.

Mr. MANN. The bill is now being read by paragraphs, and we have read the first paragraph which fixes the rate of postage on fourth-class matter.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Read section 8 as a whole.

Mr. MANN. It does not come before the House as a whole, unless by some agreement, and the gentleman might have found himself in a position where it would all be agreed to before he offered his substitute to change it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have no objection to considering it either way, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to have the whole section read and the substitute be offered for it.

Mr. MANN. Can we not have some understanding not only as to the substitute which the gentleman proposes to offer, but also as to the Goeke amendment and amendments or substitutes to the different propositions?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I had thought we would take up this section and dispose of it, and take up the Goeke amendment and dispose of it, but I have no objection to any reasonable arrangement about it.

Mr. MANN. The Goeke amendment is in order in connection with section 8, but whether it would be in order now I do not undertake to say, because that question has not arisen and may not. Can not we reach some agreement as to procedure?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the House should substitute the Goeke amendment it probably would not be considered at all. I would prefer to offer the substitute to section 8 and dispose of it and then take up the Goeke amendment.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say that if the gentleman's substitute be agreed to that the Goeke amendment will probably not be offered?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I can not say for myself. The gentlemen are present, and that is what they say.

Mr. MANN. I understand the substitute is agreeable to the gentlemen who are favoring the Goeke proposition.

Mr. LEWIS. Our understanding of the proposed substitute is that we strike out section 8, with perhaps the exception of the rural clause, and that all parcel-express legislation be taken up by the committee, covered by the substitute to be offered, to report on the first Monday in December.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] may now offer a substitute for section 8 before the rest of section 8 is read.

The CHAIRMAN. Including the Goeke amendment?

Mr. MANN. No; not including the Goeke amendment. If the substitute be not agreed to, of course the rest of section 8 would be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] be allowed now to offer his substitute for section 8.

Mr. ADAMSON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to antagonize any program of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, but I wish to say that if the time comes when a proposition from our committee to consider express rates and express companies is to be taken up I have an express bill which is made to supplement and cooperate with the Rural Delivery Service, on which I made some remarks a few weeks ago, and which I wish to offer as a substitute for the Goeke bill, if it is offered in the House.

Mr. MANN. The request would not interfere with that.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I desire to offer my bill for a general parcel post as an amendment to section 8, and I want to do so before the Goeke amendment is offered. I have no objection to having the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee read, but I wish to have my amendment read also.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] be now allowed to offer a substitute for section 8. Is there objection?

Mr. STEENERSON. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask whether it will be in order to offer more than one substitute for section 8, or to offer the substitute of the gentleman from Tennessee on the part of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it is the opinion of the Chair that it will not be in order to offer any more substitutes until the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee is disposed of.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Then I object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that section 8 may be read and considered as one section as a whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that section 8 may be read and considered as one section as a whole. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Does that include the offering of amendments to any portion of section 8?

Mr. MANN. That does not prevent the offering of amendments to any portion of section 8.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no objection, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the next section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 8. That hereafter postage shall be paid on matter of the fourth class at the rate of 12 cents per pound, except as herein provided.

That no article, package, or parcel shall be mailable as matter of the fourth class which exceeds 11 pounds in weight, except as herein provided.

That on each and all rural mail delivery routes of the United States the postmaster at the starting point of such route shall until June 30, 1914, receive and deliver to the carrier or carriers of said routes all articles, parcels, or packages not prohibited to the mails by law and falling under the definition of fourth-class matter and not weighing in excess of 11 pounds, for transportation and delivery on said routes only; and the carriers shall receive at intermediate points on all rural routes such mail matter of the fourth class for delivery on their respective routes only.

That postage shall be paid on all articles, parcels, or packages entitled to transportation under the provisions of this act as matter of the fourth class on rural mail delivery routes only at the following rates: One cent for each 2 ounces or less, 2 cents for more than 2 ounces but not more than 4 ounces, 3 cents for more than 4 ounces but not more than 8 ounces, 4 cents for more than 8 ounces but not more than 12 ounces, 5 cents for more than 12 ounces but not more than a pound, and 2 cents per pound for each additional pound or fraction thereof up to and including a total of 11 pounds. That the Postmaster General shall make all rules and regulations necessary and not inconsistent with law to the proper execution of this act.

That for the purpose of a full and complete inquiry and investigation into the feasibility and propriety of the establishment of a general parcels post a commission of six persons, three of who shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and three by the President of the Senate, is constituted, with full power to appoint clerks, stenographers, and experts to assist them in this work. They shall review the testimony already taken on the subject of parcels post by Senate and House committees and take such other testimony as they deem desirable. For the purpose of defraying the expenses of this commission, the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated out of the moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, is a substitute now in order, or will the bill have to be amended by line?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I offer a substitute, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Did I understand the gentleman from Tennessee to say that this is a committee substitute?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have not called the committee together about it, but a majority of the committee agree to it. I have not called the committee together.

Mr. MADDEN. I wanted it understood. That is all.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute, to be read for information.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is offering as a committee amendment a new section, by way of a substitute to section 8. It is a new section, is it not?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is offering a substitute for section 8.

Mr. SULZER. I wish to inquire, then, Mr. Chairman, if my amendment to strike out and insert in section 8 will be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to perfect the text of section 8.

Mr. SULZER. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That hereafter postage shall be paid on matter of the fourth class at the rate of 12 cents per pound, except as herein provided.

That no article, package, or parcel shall be mailable as matter of the fourth class which exceeds 11 pounds in weight.

That on each and all rural-delivery routes of the United States the postmaster at the starting point of such route shall, until June 30, 1914, receive and deliver to the carrier or carriers of said routes all articles, parcels, or packages not prohibited to the mails by law and falling under the definition of fourth-class matter and not weighing in excess of 11 pounds for transportation and delivery on said routes; and the carrier shall receive at intermediate points on all rural routes such mail matter of the fourth class for delivery on rural routes only.

The postage shall be paid on all articles, parcels, or packages entitled to transportation under the provisions of this act as matter of the fourth class on rural mail delivery routes only at the following rates: Five cents per pound and 1 cent per pound for each additional pound or fraction thereof up to and including a total of 11 pounds. That the Postmaster General shall make all rules and regulations necessary and not inconsistent with law to the proper performance of this act and shall provide for the transportation of farm and factory products as fourth-class matter if not perishable in transportation.

That for the purpose of a full and complete inquiry and investigation into the feasibility and propriety of the establishment of a general parcel post or express post, a joint committee of six persons, three of whom shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and three by the President of the Senate, is constituted, with full power to appoint clerks, stenographers, and experts to assist them in this work. They shall review the testimony already taken on the subject of parcel post by Senate and House committees and take such other testimony as they deem desirable. For the purpose of defraying the expenses of this commission the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated out of the moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. The committee shall report fully to Congress on the first Monday in December, 1912.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 8 and to substitute the matter just read in the place of it.

In explanation of this section, I desire to say that the bill when reported to the House was, so far as the parcel-post proposition was concerned, as nearly in skeleton form as it was possible to present the question to the House. It was not the purpose of the committee at that time to present a full and complete parcel-post system, either of a general character or confined to the rural routes, but it was its purpose to fill in the matter as far as possible, if justified in the discussion, so as to give ultimately under this legislation a complete parcel-post system, experimental for the term of two years, to the rural districts of the United States.

Before taking up the other section I will inform the House that the amendment on the rural section is this: Instead of 5 cents for 1 pound, with fractions between 5 and 11, and all other pounds at 2 cents, the proposition before the House changes it so as to give 5 cents for the carriage of the first pound and 1 cent a pound thereafter—11 pounds, the limit fixed in the bill, to be carried for 15 cents. And it is not now confined, as it was in the original proposition, to a single rural route, but the package may pass over any and all rural routes, but not over any other mail route of the Government of the United States.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman's proposition is not in print. I followed the reading very carefully in comparison with section 8 as printed, and it seemed to me that the language as to the route this special service could go over is precisely the same in the substitute as in the printed bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; it provides that a package may go over any rural route.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I have sent to the Clerk's desk an amendment by way of perfection of the printed section 8, providing for the sending of these rural-route packages over any rural routes centering in the same town, and I did not hear anything of that character read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is the evident purpose and meaning of the section that now appears in the substitute.

Mr. CANNON. That is to say, if I understand, A is the center point of a dozen rural routes. Matter originating at the central point may go to any one of the routes, and matter originating on any one of the routes may go to any one of the dozen routes centering at that place.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. But can not go a thousand miles away.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It must be confined to rural routes.

Mr. CANNON. Emanating from that point.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Emanating from that point.

Mr. SIMS. Or any loop route from any of those routes.

Mr. BUTLER. It can not go beyond rural-route territory.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is correct.

Mr. MADDEN. The question I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee, in order to get a clear idea, is this: This provision in the bill originally provided that the package must originate at the starting point of the rural delivery route, and that the carrier might deliver it at any point along that rural route, and that he might pick up any package at any intermediate point and leave it at any other intermediate point. Does the provision now offered by the gentleman from Tennessee provide that the package may be taken on to some other rural route?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It provides that it may be taken anywhere on a rural route, for delivery on a rural route.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose the package originates in the town in which the gentleman from Tennessee lives and that several rural routes start from that town. Does this provision mean that the package can only go to any of the rural routes starting from that town or that it can be transferred by rail to some other rural route?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; it does not mean that it shall be transferred by rail. It means that it may go from any rural route to any other rural route.

Mr. SIMS. Any other connecting rural route.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Confined to rural routes strictly.

Mr. MADDEN. What I want to get at is this: If there are six rural routes starting from one post office it would go on any one of those six routes. But suppose I wanted a package to reach a route that did not start from that office?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If it did not start on any rural route at all?

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose I was a thousand miles away?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. And you had to send it over some other route than a rural route?

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose I wanted to get it on some rural route on which I live?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. You could not do it unless there was a transportation by rural route to the point you wanted to reach.

Mr. MADDEN. There would be no possibility of my getting the package if I was not on a route directly served from the post office from which it starts?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly; or some connecting rural route.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee this: I listened to his substitute but did not get it very clearly in my mind. What will it cost to send a 14-ounce package, fourth-class mail matter, under his substitute?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Five cents for the first pound, and 1 cent for the next pound or fraction thereof.

Mr. MURDOCK. I am referring to packages sent from city to city and not the rural feature—a 14-ounce package.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Under the substitute that provision is 12 cents, the international rate.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then, under the substitute a 14-ounce package would cost 14 cents at the present rate, but would cost 24 cents under the gentleman's substitute?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think it would, and I am going to move to strike out the first part of the substitute.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose the package starts at a given post office to be delivered on any branch or rural route within the jurisdiction of that post office. Suppose a citizen of the United States living a hundred miles away, who was on a rural route, wanted to get the package that was coming from this post office, would there be any objection under this substitute to the transportation of that package by express to the post office from which the other route started?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. This section does not provide for anything by express.

Mr. MADDEN. No; but could you stop me?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I could not stop you. If the gentleman lived in Chicago, which he does, and wanted to send a package to some rural route in Maryland, he might express the package to the initial point of that route and then send it over the rural route. There is nothing to prevent that.

Mr. MADDEN. There would be nothing to prevent transportation of packages to any point in the United States by express for delivery on a rural route?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If you paid the expressage or you paid the ordinary mail rate and then had it sent over the rural route you could send it. You could send it at the cheap rates.

Mr. MADDEN. The original proposition reported by the committee was that the package must originate on the rural route.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It must originate on some rural route now. I do not mean that the matter must be grown up on the route, but it must be presented there.

Mr. MADDEN. I could start a factory in any town to manufacture goods to be transported by express to any rural route in the United States, and then over a rural route, under the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I did not quite catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. MADDEN. I say that this opens the whole question of transportation of any package proposed to be delivered by rural mail so that the express companies can ship the packages to the point where the rural route begins and then over the rural route at any point in the United States.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this is the simplest proposition in the world. It provides for nothing except the rate on a rural route of 5 cents for the first pound and 1 cent for each pound or fraction thereafter. The matter has to be delivered on a rural route and for delivery ultimately on some other rural route.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

The was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I think I understand where the mail originates on the rural route, and it seems to me that that has been gone over three or four times. As I understand the gentleman's proposition, a package could be shipped from New York to any place in the United States on a rural route, but the rate of postage would be what we call the international rate. Is that correct?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question. It may have been answered, but if it was I did not hear it. I want to take up the proposition suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. Suppose there is a post office with 6 routes, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, and a parcel is started out in the country on one route and brought into the post office and then sent out on another route from the same post office, can that be done, under the gentleman's substitute, for one postage?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The mail matter of the fourth class under the low rate may pass over any rural route, but not over any other mail route.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Can it come in on one and go out over another?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; of course.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, under the gentleman's proposed substitute can a merchant in a city send through the post office 11 pounds to anybody living in the country?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. He can do it if he will go to the post office and start it on a rural route.

Mr. SULZER. What will it cost him to do it?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. On 11 pounds it will cost him 15 cents under this amendment.

Mr. SULZER. How will he get it from the city to the rural route?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The rural routes emanate often from the city. Matters are sent off on the rural routes from the city. If he wants to send it on one of those rural routes, he could do it. If he wants to send it on a mail route and then to a rural route, he would have to pay ordinary postage.

Mr. SULZER. Do I understand the gentleman from Tennessee to tell us that under his amendment which has just been read anybody in the United States can send 11 pounds through the mails for 25 cents on any rural route to any place in the United States?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Oh, no.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to have the matter elucidated, so that we can understand.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is very easily understood, if the gentleman will think about it for one minute. The rate is intended for rural routes only. If the matter passes over any other route than a rural route, the rate does not apply.

Mr. SULZER. Then you would have to pay just the same as you do now?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Of course. I am not attempting to cover the general parcel post with this.

Mr. SULZER. Then this would bring practically no relief to the people of the United States.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I understand, in a general way, that the difference between the gentleman's original proposition and the substitute is that in the original proposition you could send a package from one point to another point on a single route emanating from the same post office.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But under the substitute you could send a package from a point on one route to any point on any other route emanating from the same office.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; provided it all passes over a rural route and nothing else.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be granted 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman whether, inasmuch as this proposed substitute has not been printed and there has been no opportunity for the membership to study it, it can not go over until to-morrow or next day?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will answer the gentleman's question by stating that it is possible to have it go over, but there would be no sense in doing it. It is a simple thing. There is very little change from the original proposition.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I followed the reading of the proposed substitute from the desk. In the middle of page 36 there are only three words that are stricken out. If the gentleman, instead of considering the entire matter, will consider it paragraph by paragraph, I think we can understand it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the gentleman will listen I will explain it. I can not fully do it by having questions asked.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment will be again reported.

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not reserve the right to object.

Mr. DYER. I want to ask the gentleman how long it will take to explain it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we all keep quiet and listen to the Clerk.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if it is desired I will explain this section for a moment without further interrogatory. On the twenty-fourth line we want to strike out the words "except as herein provided." It is not necessary to continue those words in this amendment. We have enlarged the question of transportation on rural routes from one route, which it is limited to in this bill, to any number of routes from the initial point, so the matter is carried exclusively over rural routes. The rate is changed from 25 cents for 11 pounds to 15 cents for 11 pounds, and the other provision is that the Postmaster General in making rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act shall provide for transportation of products of the farm and factories as merchandise matter of the fourth class which is not perishable in transportation.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I can not yield any more now. The second section provides simply this: It will be remembered in the House that we created a commission of six persons, three to be appointed by the Speaker and three by the President. This is changed to a committee instead of a commission, and instead of having the subject of the inquiry limited to the general parcel-post proposition, it is extended to the express post also, and they are required to report upon testimony that has already been made upon both of those subjects and to take such other testimony as they may desire and report on the first Monday in December. Our idea was this, that we could establish now the parcel-post proposition upon the rural districts, as provided in the substitute, without loss of revenue to the Government, because all of the machinery is in force to carry it out, and it is an experiment for the term of two years. But in the other question, for the various reasons assigned in the report, it seems to be evident to gentlemen who have heard the discussion upon this floor that it would not be wise to undertake to establish a general parcel post nor an express post in this country without more information on the question.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order. We can not hear the gentleman here, and it is a very important subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the committee, as I was about to remark when interrupted, was to secure information as to the wisdom of establishing in this country a parcel post or an express post. It seems to be evident to gentlemen from this debate that while we can establish a rural parcel post upon the line of the substitute without danger to our revenue, that you can not establish a general parcel post now for the want of knowledge as to how your revenues will be affected by its establishment; and certainly the establishment of an express post leading to the committing to the mails of the United States matter to the extent of 100 pounds would be a very dangerous experiment without a report from a commission, so in order to cover the whole question of parcel post in its general character and the express post, we deemed it wise to have a committee make an inquiry into the subject. Let the committee determine what effect it will have upon our revenues, what additional officeholders we must have, what additional machinery we must have, what effect it has as to concentration of trade, what effect it will have upon the rural districts, and the various number of questions that enter into the discussion of a matter of this sort. It is a matter of too great importance for this House to act upon without clearly seeing the wisdom and the sense of the policy we are to pursue. Now, in regard to the rural matter, I think it is safe so far as revenues are concerned, with the reduction in the amount we have placed in the substitute, to say that the revenues coming to the Government of the United States supplementing the deficiency in the rural routes would probably be five or six million dollars under this section per annum; but under the other proposition, a proposition for a general parcel post, in view of the fact that the express companies in the United States get a rate of three-quarters of a cent a pound, and the Government for the handling of transportation must pay from 6 to 8 cents, makes it impossible to compete with them on equal terms.

If you can not enter upon competition under the present state of the law, it would seem wise for this commission to inquire and for the House to act and force the railroad company now, if you want to carry out this policy, to give to the Government the same rate that is given to express companies. We must do all we can to secure speedily a wise parcel-post system for all the people without detriment to any class. Of course, I take it that no gentleman desires seriously to consider the question of paying $40,000,000 to the express companies for their holdings, nor do you desire to undertake the confiscation of their property or their contracts. The governmental right to enter into or upon this business exists under the Constitution. Whether it is wise to go into it to the extent some gentlemen insist I do not know. I think none of us will know until we have heard from a commission that can report the facts to this House, and then we will have an intelligent opinion on a question which, if you go into uninformed and blindly now, will put the Treasury to a loss of some $50,000,000 annually. If we proceed cautiously and with full knowledge, we can accommodate the people and protect the Treasury, too.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has expired.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to a question?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. My time has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] may have 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may have 10 minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object——

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the request.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I decline to discuss the question further.

Mr. RAKER. I withdraw my objection, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] offers an amendment to the substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the substitute:

"That there is hereby constituted a joint committee consisting of three Members of the House to be appointed by the Speaker and three Members of the Senate to be appointed by the Vice President; that all bills on the subject of parcel post or postal express shall be referred to said committee, and that said joint committee shall prepare and report to both Houses of Congress on or before the first Monday in December, 1912, a bill providing for such legislation that said joint committee shall deem proper."

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, by the way of explanation of the amendment offered, I know how serious and sincere most of the membership of this House is with regard to securing a proper solution of the transport of the small package. I do not pretend to be more sincere or serious than any other Member of this House. It must be manifest, however, to all thoughtful men here that since this is the first time in the history of Congress the subject has received any discussion whatever, and since many forms in the way of remedy have been presented here, there is some danger of error being committed by the hasty action which would be absolutely necessary under the five-minute rule in the situation in which we find ourselves. Nobody is more concerned as to his ideals and his method of treating the subject than I am at this moment, and yet I feel the subject, the country, and the convictions of the membership of this House are all of an order of importance that requires that a little more thought and time be given the subject.

My amendment, therefore, proposes that the whole of section 8 go out, that in its place a committee having the confidence of this House be appointed by the Speaker and a like committee by the Senate under the mandate to report a bill on this subject the first Monday in December.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman desire to have the rural-route proposition postponed at all?

Mr. LEWIS. I am not particularly concerned about the rural route, but I believe this is an entire subject, and it would be best for the subject and for the House and for the country that it be taken up as such.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I do not yield. I rise only to make a statement. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a momentous occasion to the American people. For 40 years they have been waiting upon this Congress to give the subject of the small package proper attention. It has failed to even hear their clamors up to this moment. If it listens now, I know it will give them a stone instead of bread, although I know it wishes to do its patriotic duty at the same time. In my judgment—and, I believe, a judgment as well informed on this subject as it possibly might be—the best thing we can do with this topic is to give a committee an opportunity to examine the subject matter under a mandate to report a bill on the first Monday in December. [Applause.]

Mr. SULZER and Mr. FINLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to section 8 of the bill and ask to have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand the gentleman offers an amendment to section 8?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; to section 8.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. SULZER. Strike out all after the first word of section 8 and insert the amendment I now offer.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman offer the amendment or ask to have it read in his time?

Mr. SULZER. It is in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman can not offer it. There is already one amendment pending to the substitute, and there can be only one.

Mr. SULZER. It is offered as an amendment to the original section—that is, section 8. To strike out and insert.

The CHAIRMAN. And insert the following?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; and insert the following.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FOSTER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

The Clerk read as follows:

The common weight limit of the domestic postal service of the United States is hereby increased to 11 pounds, the common limit of the Universal Postal Union, and that in the general business of the post office the 1-cent-an-ounce rate on general merchandise—fourth-class mail matter—be, and is hereby, reduced to the third-class rate, 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof.

That the rate on local letters or sealed parcels posted for delivery within the free-delivery services is hereby determined at 2 cents on parcels up to 4 ounces, 1 cent on each additional 2 ounces; at nondelivery offices, 1 cent for each 2 ounces.

That all mail matter collected and delivered within the different rural routes of the United States is hereby determined to be in one class, with rates, door to door, between the different houses and places of business and the post office or post offices on each route, as follows: On parcels up to one twenty-fourth of a cubic foot, or 1 by 6 by 12 inches in dimensions and up to 1 pound in weight, 1 cent; on larger parcels up to one-half a cubic foot, or 6 by 12 by 12 inches in dimensions and up to 11 pounds in weight, 5 cents; on larger parcels up to 1 cubic foot, 6 by 12 by 24 inches in dimensions and up to 25 pounds in weight, 10 cents. No parcel shall be over 6 feet in length, and in no case shall a carrier be obliged to transport a load of over 500 pounds.

That on all unregistered prepaid mail matter without declared value an indemnity up to $10 shall be paid by the Post Office Department for such actual loss or damage as may occur through the fault of the postal service, and this without extra charge. Certificates of posting shall be provided on demand. On registered parcels of declared value, and on which the fee for registration, insurance, and postage has been duly prepaid, the Post Office Department shall pay the full value of any direct loss or damage that may occur through the fault of the postal service. The fees for insurance and registration shall be as follows: For registration and insurance up to $50, 10 cents; for each additional $50, 2 cents. No claim for compensation will be admitted if not presented within one year after the parcel is posted.

That the word "packet" wherever used in laws relating to the postal service means all matter of every class which is by law made mailable.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is a substitute in the third degree, and is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has offered it as a substitute for section 8 of the bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman to say that he was offering it as a substitute.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by me provides for a general parcel post. It is similar to the law in every civilized county on the earth. It increases the weight of the package from 4 pounds to 11 pounds. It reduces the price from 16 cents a pound to 8 cents a pound, the cost per pound prior to 1879. If my amendment is adopted, we will have in the United States a general parcel post, with a weight limit of 11 pounds, at a cost of 8 cents per pound.

Just think of it. A person living in any part of Europe can send to any part of the United States by mail a parcel weighing two and one-half times more than the United States limit for about one-third less in cost than the present home rates. In other words, the world postal-union package unit is 11 pounds to the parcel, at the rate of 12 cents per pound, whereas the United States unit is only 4 pounds to the package and at a cost of 16 cents to the pound. The parcel rate in the United States prior to 1879 was 8 cents per pound for a package limited to a weight of 4 pounds. After that the rate was doubled, but the weight remained the same. Since 1879 the cost of transportation has greatly decreased. The question is, Why should not the people be given the benefit of this decrease by the establishment of a uniform low postal rate for parcels that will encourage the use of the post office as a medium of exchange of commodities and thus greatly facilitate trade?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. SULZER. I regret I can not. I have only a few moments.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] has said this is an important matter. So it is, a very important matter to the people of this country. For years they have asked for this general parcel-post legislation. I differ with the gentleman when he asks us now to postpone this legislation until next year. I want to give the people a general parcel post this year. [Applause.] The express companies have had their way long enough. [Applause.]

My bill for a general parcel post—identical with the amendment I have just offered—has been pending in Congress for several years. I want no credit for being its author. I want results. Mr. Bennet, a former Republican Congressman from New York, introduced a similar bill in the last Congress. Slightly changed, I introduced it in this Congress. There is no politics in it. It is nonpartisan. There is no sectionalism in it. The people want it. It is a general parcel-post bill, and every Member who is in favor of giving the people what they want should vote for this amendment.

This amendment is what the people want now. It raises the weight limit of the package from 4 pounds to 11 pounds, and reduces the postage on the parcel from 16 cents a pound to 8 cents a pound, and that was the postal rate for many years until the express companies doubled it in 1879.

This amendment is what the farmers want, what their Representatives come to Congress and asked for. This amendment is what the business people of the country want. They sent their representatives here, and asked for it through the Post Office Committee. This amendment is what the consumers want. Over ten millions of American taxpayers have sent representatives here pleading for this general parcel-post legislation. Why longer delay? For one, I am opposed to further delay. I am in favor of giving the people now a general parcel-post law, as provided in my amendment. [Applause.]

I am opposed to any more commissions to delay the matter. We have had committee after committee investigating this subject. Commission after commission has come and gone—and nothing is done. They have taken testimony mountains high. I have read a great deal of it, and everyone familiar with the proposition has recommended a general parcel post—not a limited parcel post such as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] would now give us, which would let the boy go to school, but would prevent him from coming home again—but a genuine general parcel post.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman say when was that commission?

Mr. SULZER. I can not yield. I want to give the people a general parcel post that will let the producer send his merchandise to the consumer; that will let the consumer send his manufactured product to the farmers; that will bring them closer together in trade and commerce, and cheapen the cost of the necessaries of life. I want a general parcel post that will work both ways. The parcel post proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee works only one way. That will not do much good. It is little better than what we have to-day. The people will not be satisfied with such a pretense, with such a mere makeshift, with such a mockery.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for a few minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. Ask for five minutes. I want to ask you about the rural features of your amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, my amendment allows packages up to 11 pounds to go through the mails throughout the United States for 8 cents a pound——

Mr. SIMS. Originating on or delivered on rural routes? How is it?

Mr. SULZER. The amendment is clear and explicit. It provides that packages weighing not more than 11 pounds can go over all postal routes from one part of the country to the other for 8 cents a pound. There is no reason in the world why the people of the United States should be deprived of the advantages of this benign legislation for a general parcel post, that will bring producers and consumers in closer touch and be of inestimable benefit to all the people, especially those who dwell in the large cities and live in the producing sections of the country. It has been adopted in every European country, and it ought to be adopted here. We have made postal conventions with the countries of the world by which their citizens can send through the mails to any part of the United States packages weighing 11 pounds at the universal postal rate, and the people of the United States are prohibited from doing the same thing in their own country because of our failure to enact a similar postal parcel law. It is a great injustice to the taxpayers of this country. It is a discrimination in favor of the foreigner against the citizen of the United States which is repugnant to my sense of justice. I am opposed to this inequality. I want to obviate it. The Postal Progress League has indorsed my plan, and, as I have stated, the representatives of over 10,000,000 taxpayers of this country appeared before the committee and urged its enactment. Why should it not be enacted into law?

The time is now at hand for Congress to heed the insistent demand of the people for a general parcel post along the lines of my amendment—the express companies, the middlemen, and others to the contrary notwithstanding.

Just a few words more. I want to do all I can to reduce the cost of the necessaries of life to the consumer. That is a great live question to-day in every home in America, and one of the best ways, in my opinion, to solve the problem and reduce the cost of the necessaries of life is to bring the producer and the consumer closer together, and nothing will have a tendency to do that more than this agency of a general parcel post. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FINLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] is recognized.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY], a member of the committee, has the floor.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will say to the Chairman that I have been a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and I have been trying to get recognition for the last half hour.

Mr. FINLEY. I am perfectly willing to give way to the gentleman from Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is out of order.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the proposition that is offered here by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] strikes out the proposed parcel-post on rural routes. I take it that no one here seriously wishes to do that. We have the machinery. As has been stated repeatedly, we have the rural carriers with their equipment, and we have fixed a low rate in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], the chairman of the Post Office Committee.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. I am frank to say, so far as I am concerned, that if the substitute is confined to the rural routes and the appointment of a committee of three of the House and three of the Senate, I believe that would be a very wise disposition of the subject at this time; but when you go into the flat rate, 12-cent proposition, I disagree with you.

Mr. FINLEY. I think there is no question about the wisdom of the parcel post on rural routes as we have provided it here.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] offers a flat rate of 8 cents a pound. I ask the membership of this House, Are you ready to vote for that offhand? Are you prepared? Have you the information? In thousands of instances the rate would be entirely too high, and in some others it might be too low. I do not know about that. But here is a proposition to investigate this matter by a joint committee of the House and Senate, the same thing as a commission, and to bring to Congress accurate information. Now, what is the harm of waiting until next December to take up the question of a general parcel post or an express or railway post? We are not in such a hurry about it that the first time the proposition is presented in this House we must fall over ourselves before we are informed, before we know.

To my mind, a flat rate is indefensible. It is not worth 8 cents a pound to transport a package a pound in weight 2, 3, 5, 10, 50, or 100 miles, or even farther. The proposition offered here by the chairman of the Post Office Committee is eminently wise. It is carefully considered. The rights of the people are amply protected. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] will be voted down. It should be voted down. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the amendment:

"That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to require companies operating railroads by steam, electricity, or other motive power carrying the mails to furnish under oath and seal, not less frequently than once in each fiscal year, such information relating to the service, operation, receipts, and expenditures of such roads for a period of not less than 30 days, to be designated by him, as may in his judgment be deemed necessary to enable him to ascertain the cost to the companies of carrying the mails on their respective roads and the proper compensation to be paid for that service. He shall require of such companies to submit such information not later than March 1, 1913, and in each fiscal year thereafter at such times and for such periods as he shall prescribe. It shall be the duty of such railroad companies to furnish such information, and if any railroad company fails or refuses to do so when required, its compensation for service rendered thereafter until such company shall comply and an adjustment is made by the Postmaster General shall be forfeited to the United States and shall be withheld as liquidated damages.

"SEC. 2. That if any officer, agent, or employee of a railroad company shall knowingly furnish any information required under the provisions of this act that is false and fraudulent, he shall be fined not more than $20,000 and imprisoned not more than five years.

"SEC. 3. That the Postmaster General shall determine the cost to each railroad company of carrying the mails on its respective road or roads, and shall verify and state the result in such form and manner as he shall deem proper. For this purpose he is authorized to credit, assign, and apportion the revenues and expenses of railroad companies so reported in such manner as he shall deem fair and equitable and in his judgment necessary to ascertain the cost as near as practicable, a statement of which shall be given the company concerned. If any railroad company shall object to the method of crediting, assigning, and apportioning the revenues and expenses, it may file objection with the Postmaster General within 20 days after such statement is made to the company, and the Postmaster General shall thereupon certify the method and objection and such papers as in his judgment may be essential to an understanding of the method to the Interstate Commerce Commission, who shall review the finding of the Postmaster General and affirm, modify, or revise the same, and certify the result to the Postmaster General, which action thereon shall be final."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if it be in order before the completion of the reading of that amendment, I make the point of order that it is not in order.

Mr. STEENERSON. Perhaps it would be in order on the gentleman's substitute. If so, I will withdraw it for the present, and offer it as an amendment to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the amendment to be for the purpose of having the Postmaster General ascertain about the weighing of the mails carried on railroads.

Mr. STEENERSON. It is a readjustment or a new plan, a new basis of railway mail pay. The Post Office Department has been at work at it for three years—since 1909. It is a substitute for the present payment by weight. It substitutes a different system.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Minnesota upon what theory he thinks that is germane to an amendment dealing with a parcel post?

Mr. STEENERSON. Because the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] provides for carrying heavyweight packages at a very low rate which would enormously increase the railway mail pay because the railroads are paid by weight. And in order to escape the loss of hundreds of millions of dollars we would have to substitute a new method of paying for the carriage of the mails on railways. That makes it germane to the proposition. It proposes a new provision of law governing the carriage of freight by mail. Therefore you ought to substitute a new system of paying the railways for carrying that freight. You can not, without enormous loss, carry under the present system of computing railway pay. That is the reason it is germane to the proposition of the gentleman from New York, as I contend.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, before the amendment is reported I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not understand that the amendment of the gentleman from New York is pending before the House. I understand that the pending amendment is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that the gentleman from New York offered an amendment to the text of the bill, which is pending. Now, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] moves to amend that amendment, which he has a right to do. The Clerk will report the amendment.
